MIRACLES & TRAGEDIES: United Synagogue Day School's middle school students and their families recently had the opportunity to see the play Miracles and Tragedies, performed by the Nefesh Theatre and brought to Toronto by Aviva Reifer, right, the new educational emissary for the Jewish National Fund. The play is about a boy on the brink of his bar mitzvah who is confused and full of hostility, and about his grandfather's experiences during the Holocaust.

Himel known for excellence on the court, as a mensch off it

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Obituary

In the 1940s, '50s and '60s, the Jewish community produced a number of basketball teams and players who could compete with anyone. The YMHA squad was legendary, and many of its athletes went on to championships, both with the Y and with other, sponsored teams.

Sydney Himel was one of the better players of his generation, a downtown guy who played for the Y, his school, Harbord Collegiate, the University of Toronto varsity squad, Tri-Bell and Runnymede Steel, as well as Canada's Maccabiah team at the first two postwar games.

Himel, who went on to coach the boys' hoops team at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) for many years, died recently after a lengthy illness. He was 81.

In addition to his athletic career, Himel was remembered as a devoted family man, a lawyer to underprivileged immigrants and as the president of his synagogue.

Willie Silverman, 76, played with Himel in the late 1950s and early '60s. He recalled him as a talented player who dished the ball well and who was an accurate shooter.

"He was a great player," Silverman said. "He played guard. He had a fantastic shot. He was a team player. I liked playing with him. He gave us the ball."

As teammates in 1955, they played for a group sponsored by Runnymede Steel. It was the one year the two did not play for the YMHA and the team, which was about half Jewish, went on to win the Canadian Intermediate Championship.

"Syd was one of the better players in Canada," Silverman said.

Ted Schmidt, who grew up on Palmerston Boulevard surrounded mostly by Jewish neighbours, said he first met Himel in the mid-1970s when, as CHAT's coach, Himel approached him with the proposal that the Jewish school join the Roman Catholic high school sports league, the TDCAA.

"When Syd came, I saw this beautiful face and I said, 'Don't worry, you're in. I'm the convener.'"

"My whole background was 'open the tent.' When Syd appeared, I said 'This is great. Why shouldn't they play?'"

Himel was "tremendously down to earth, folksy and humble. He had no chip on his shoulder. He was a mensch," Schmidt recalled.

The early CHAT teams prepared by Himel "were well coached, but they didn't have the personnel. Syd was trying to drill them in good old downtown Jewish basketball." That included strong fundamentals, team play and emphasis on the give-and-go and pick and roll, Schmidt said.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, the rabbi emeritus at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue who attended Harbord Collegiate with Himel, said Himel was a star back in high school. But outside of his athletic career, he became a successful lawyer and a coach to the young men at CHAT. "He was a real mensch," Rabbi Kelman said. "He treated you with respect. He helped people in a very quiet, easygoing way."

While Himel was comfortable on the basketball court and in his legal practice, he also was a devoted Jew who continued his father's tradition as president of his synagogue, the Hebrew Men of England. He was also an integral part of the negotiations that saw that shul merge with the Beth Emeth into what is today the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

TV journalist Martin Himel, one of Sydney's sons, said he and his brother Daniel Marom owe their lives to their father's interest in basketball. It was while playing for Canada at the second postwar Maccabiah in 1954 that their parents met. Martin noted that his Hebrew name, Maccabi, reflects the importance of the games to his parents.

Himel shared his love of the sport with the youngsters at CHAT. Marom recalled that while working as a full-time lawyer, his father inaugurated the basketball program at the Jewish high school in the early 1970s. He would go on to coach there for 10 years and, through his contacts with Schmidt, he helped get CHAT into the TDCAA.

All CHAT teams now play in the league, Marom noted.

His father not only taught basic game skills – shooting, passing, dribbling – but "he took us outside to games and taught us to be proud.

"We were day school kids, kind of soft, into [our] own bubble." His father grew up around Kensington and Dundas, where his grandparents ran a small store. "The generation that came out of Harbord was tough, hard-nosed. Dad brought that kind of attitude, to get serious, don't be nebbishes.

"He taught us to be good Jews outside the day school bubble."

Himel is survived by his sons, Martin and Daniel, Hyla Aronoff and their families.

Peer ranked 15th in tennis

MELBOURNE, Australia — Israeli tennis star Shahar Peer reached the quarterfinals of the Australian Open recently before losing to American Serena Williams.

Peer, 19, was already in uncharted territory for an Israeli woman by reaching the last eight of a grand slam, and she had one foot in the semifinals until Williams, the seven-time major winner, shut the door after three tight sets.

The unseeded Williams, champion in 2003 and 2005, won 3-6, 6-2, 8-6 in two hours and 34 minutes after Peer had come within two points of victory.

Peer is now listed at 15th in the WTA rankings – the highest ever for an Israeli woman.

Lessons learned from Mrs. Wolfman

20Something

I'm not sure whether it's a consequence of writing and reading news for a living, but often times I can't help but wonder when tragedy will strike those I love.

As children of the baby-boomer generation, our parents are starting to enter that certain age in which life is a bit more fragile and our grandparents, if we are still blessed to have them with us, are suffering from the maladies of old age.

The thought of anything bad happening to my family keeps me up at night, as I can't begin to fathom how I would begin to say goodbye to the people whom I love and cherish more than anything else in the world.

But it was a very special woman, a dear friend of the family, who made me realize the only way to say goodbye is to live your life with only love in your heart and kind words for the special people around you.

Mrs. Wolfman is a woman I have only met a couple of times, but nonetheless, she is someone whose wisdom I carry with me each day. Though the last couple of years have been hard on her health, she has lived each day with only one thought in mind, to remind her family and friends how important each one of them is as an individual and how special each one is to her.

She has compiled a book filled with countless poems, anecdotes, pictures and messages of love that were either written to her by her children and precious grandchildren or were written by her to her family. She made a copy of the book for each member of the family, for them to keep for generations after she has passed so that her love, too, will continue to exist.

She has also taken each grandchild aside privately, no matter how young or old, to tell them the important lessons she has learned from life so that they can carry on in their young lives armed with the wisdom of a woman who has seen a lifetime.

Even to those who haven't been lucky enough to grow up beside her, Mrs. Wolfman never fails to offer words of support and encouragement. Though we have met only a few times, she is always one of the first people to tell my mom how proud she is of me.

If I learned I had to say goodbye to everyone I love tomorrow, I could only hope to have enough courage to get over the sadness of having to leave it all, and embrace the power to be able to leave my love behind.

But the most beautiful piece of wisdom Mrs. Wolfman has taught me is how important it is to live each day as if it were your last.

After you slam a door behind you in anger, open it up again and think about what you are doing. When hateful words of anger are at the tip of your tongue, swallow them and think about what you would say instead if those words were to be your last.

Being a news reporter is a constant reminder of how fragile and tragic life can be, and sometimes I think I will probably need professional help to get over it. But then, I come across people like Mrs. Wolfman and I realize we only have today to make it work and that therefore only today, only each moment, is what really counts.

YUMMY BRISKET

1 pkg. onion soup mix
1 1/2 c Burgundy wine
1/4 c water
2 tblsp flour
1 tblsp dried basil
2 tsp dried thyme
1/3 c orange marmalade
1 1/2 tsp. grated orange peel
2 tsp sugar
4 cloves garlic, minced
1/2 tsp pepper
1 (4-lb.) brisket
1 lb. mushrooms, halved

Preheat oven to 300°F. In bottom of roasting pan, stir until blended: soup mix, wine, water and flour. Add basil, thyme, marmalade, orange peel, sugar, garlic and pepper. Place brisket in pan; spoon some sauce over the top. Cover and bake 4 hrs., basting hourly until tender when pierced with a fork.

Remove roasting pan from oven, let brisket cool; wrap in heavy foil and refrigerate. Pour sauce into container and refrigerate. When ready to serve, remove solidified fat from sauce and discard. Slice brisket thinly against the grain. Place brisket slices in roasting pan; pour sauce over meat. Bring to room temperature before reheating.

To Reheat: Preheat oven to 350°F. Add mushrooms to meat, basting with sauce. Bake 40-50 min. covered with foil, basting once, until heated through and mushrooms are tender.

About Life

Dear Ella,

We only have one child, Dylan, and we want to give him the best life that we can.

One of the biggest decisions we have to make is about Dylan's schooling. We are in the process of trying to decide if public or parochial school is the right path for him. We've done our share of research, and on paper at least, it looks like we are leaning toward a Hebrew day school for Dylan. However, I live near one of the parochial schools and when school lets out, it is complete mayhem. It's like a pack of wild animals with no social or behavioural skills has been unleashed on our quiet neighborhood. I think I would just die if my son was part of that pack. When the public school lets out, it's not the same type of scene. We are really torn. Do you have an opinion on this?

Important Decision

Dear Important Decision

You are right that this decision will establish many behavioural, moral and educational patterns that your child will carry with him into his adult life. You are also right not to make this decision hastily.

There are many pros and cons in both types of education, and only you as parents can decide which best fits your child's needs, personality and capabilities.

I understand what you are saying about what you see when the bell rings, but you have to remember that there's more to what's going on than what you see on the surface.

Children in Jewish day schools have a much longer day than their public school counterparts. They have both an English and Hebrew/Jewish studies curriculum and a larger workload, both in the classroom and likely at home as well. The demands on them are higher, and along with that there is added pressure and stress.

I believe that a child's best chance for success lies in the hands of great teachers, and they can be found in both types of schools. Some years your child will have an outstanding teacher, and some years he won't.

You need to weigh all the facts; you need to talk to other parents, to principals, to teachers; and you need to be hands-on parents and work with Dylan's educators and his school system to give him the best opportunities that life has to offer.

The tao of kippah-wearing

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

In Hebrew, the word kippah means dome, and it refers to the skullcap that Jews wear, some regularly and others for prayer. The Yiddish word yarmulke is synonymous with the work kippah. The word may have evolved from the Aramaic phrase "yari malka," meaning "fear of the King." Traditionally, Jews believe one should wear a yarmulke to remind us that we should fear "the King" – meaning God.

Most sages believe that wearing a kippah is a tradition as opposed to a Torah commandment. The Talmud (in Shabbat 156b) states, "Cover your head in order that the fear of heaven may be upon you." A second source (Kiddushin 31a) says Rabbi Huna, the son of Rabbi Joshua, never walked four cubits (two metres) with his head uncovered. He explained: "Because the Divine Presence is always over my head."

As a five-year-old, I wore my kippah on a regular basis. I attended public school in Kitchener, Ont., and some of my schoolmates would bully me and yell anti-Semitic epithets. At the end of kindergarten, at six years old, I told my father that I would no longer wear my kippah to school, as it was not safe. He agreed, and the following year my head was bare when the school bell rang the morning after Labour Day.

When a big wind is coming your way, the best thing you can do to make sure that your kippah doesn't blow off is to bend your head ever so slightly and tilt it so that the wind is pushing down on the skullcap. Such is the lesson learned from wearing a kippah in a windy winter climate.

Frequently, the colour and fabric of a kippah can be a sign of adherence to a specific religious movement. The Israeli religious Zionist community is often referred to by the name "kippot srugot" or "knitted kippot," which are generally crocheted. Modern Orthodox Jews often wear suede or leather yarmulkes, requiring clips to hold them in place. Haredi Jews (ultra-right-wing Orthodox Jews) usually wear black velvet kippot. Sometimes these are referred to as "kippot shchorot" – literally "black kippot."

How often have you been at shul and seen, during the rabbi's speech, a bar mitzvah guest who is unfamiliar with the accepted mode of safe kippah wearing suddenly reach back as his skullcap begins to slide off and fall to the floor. To the credit of regular shul-goers, the people sitting behind him will scramble to get the kippah back on his head. Inevitably, however, the kippah always seems to fall a second, and sometimes a third or fourth, time.

Wearing a kippah can be difficult, especially if you have a limited amount of hair on your head or are completely bald. This challenge was partially remedied a few years ago when an ingenious skullcap manufacturer created "kip-ons," or a kippah with Velcro attached in two or three places inside the kippah. Kippah clips have also evolved over the years from regular old bobby pins to snap-in-place pins, which minimize the pain associated with putting the pin on.

Kippot come in many different sizes and colours. There are a plethora of websites where you can buy hand-painted and hand-knitted kippot, or a black velvet one.

Regardless of what kind of kippah you wear, and how often you wear it, this unique skullcap is part of the uniform of the Jewish people. The kippah does indeed contribute to our identity through its distinctive character and our adherence to wearing it.

It is easy, and can be scary, to forget that we are not alone. A kippah is a voice on top of your head, a reminder – and a loud and clear one.

Physician shortage hindering health care, doctors say

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A shortage of family doctors is a major stumbling block to the timely delivery of both primary and specialized care in Canada.

According to a report recently released by the College of Family Physicians of Canada (CFPC), many Canadians are still struggling to find a family doctor.

"Approximately five million Canadians (17 per cent) report they do not have a family doctor as their first point of contact when they need to access medical care," the report says. "Of these, almost two million (38 per cent) have tried to find a family doctor in the past year, but failed."

The CFPC report notes that each year, millions of Canadians depend on their family doctor to arrange referrals for more highly specialized services.

"Delays are experienced by patients waiting for such appointments and treatments. For the millions of people without a family doctor and who need referral, the wait times are even longer."

Three family physicians spoke to The CJN about the shortage of doctors and the long wait lists.

"Family medicine has become unappealing because we have to know everything and we've been underfunded," says Dr. Sidney Nusinowitz, a family doctor for 27 years whose practice is at Lawrence Avenue and Bathurst Street.

He notes that there have been cutbacks to family doctors since the 1980s, which is even more serious in view of the fact that there is a growing aging population. He says a family doctor receives $29 a patient visit and $17.75 to visit a patient in a hospital.

"My gas and parking cost more," Nusinowitz says.

He adds that more than 50 per cent of medical students are female and many of them work part time so that they can raise a family.

Many family doctors do not take new patients. "We need more people to get into medical schools."

Dr. Jason Baker and Dr. Ellen Morch, who are married and have three children, opened a family medicine practice in October on St. Clair Avenue West.

Baker received his medical degree at the University of Western Ontario, and Morch graduated from the University of British Columbia. They met during their family medicine residency at the University of Ottawa.

They chose to practise family medicine in Renfrew, Ont., but after seven years, they left to establish their practice in Toronto, as they felt the educational opportunities for their children would be best there. The children attend Leo Baeck Day School where their father was a student.

Morch stresses that there is a need for better financial incentives for family doctors and alternate funding models.

Baker believes that before medical students choose a specialty, they should all be part of a mandatory rural family practice rotation to give them an understanding that there is more to family medicine than what is taught at a big city teaching hospital.

He adds that this experience would provide greater confidence and less need for family doctors to refer to specialists for the work-up of common problems, thus reducing wait times for specialists.

Family doctors Jason Baker and Ellen Morch

"Family doctors are often spoken poorly of in academic settings, casting a negative attitude toward family medicine as a whole," he says.

"Improving the image of family doctors in tertiary-care training centres would then increase medicine residency programs and increase the number of family doctors.

"Increasing funding or bursaries for family doctors could be a good benefit upon graduation."

"Unfortunately," Morch says, many family doctors in Toronto are leaving their practices for other types of positions such as a clinical assistant in a hospital.

"Our practice is filling up very quickly and we may not be able to accept new patients by this summer."

Couples try natural approaches to conception

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

"We were young. I never thought it would be an issue," says Caroline Pereira, 28, of her attempts to get pregnant. "I come from a super-fertile family."

But after 1½ years of letting nature and western medicine take their course, Pereira and husband Matthew, 32, of Toronto, embraced a more holistic approach.

The couple turned to Judith Fiore, a Toronto naturopathic doctor who spends at least an hour with new patients.

"We go through their medical history… previous fertility treatment… drugs, and what the protocol was… I also take pulses, a way of assessment in the system of Chinese medicine." She may recommend homeopathy, herbs or acupuncture, or make lifestyle or diet recommendations.

After six months, says Pereira, "I started to lose weight, I was feeling much more fit."

But the biggest surprise, she says, was how Fiore focused not just on her physical but on her emotional, spiritual and mental well-being.

"Emotionally, I was opening up things that I hadn't thought about in years… Psychologically, I think that had quite a bit to do with where we were."

"Stress can have an effect on your fertility," says Dr. Clifford Librach, director and founder of Toronto's CReATe In-Vitro Fertilization (IVF) program, which is associated with Sunnybrook Women's College Hospital. "In the animal kingdom, if there's no food, or predators… their whole reproductive system turns off."

Anything that relaxes you can improve your chance of conceiving

"Anything that relaxes you," says Librach. "Massage, yoga… going on a vacation, can improve your chances of conceiving to some extent."

"Stress isn't going to make your tubes blocked. Reducing stress isn't going to make sperm count go up."

Librach adds that he hasn't seen a scientific basis for most natural treatments. "Do not rely on these kinds of things to replace going to a doctor."

While Fiore often suggests herbs such as vitex agnus castus, or chasteberry, to restore hormonal balance and cycle regularity, Librach says no herbal or natural treatment has been proven effective.

Nevertheless, Pereira and many others insist that they make a difference.

"I used to have severe menstrual cramps," Pereira says "Four months into seeing [Fiore], they completely eased up."

Fiore cautions patients never to use herbs alongside fertility drugs. And she notes that natural remedies don't work overnight – it can take several cycles before their effect is noticeable. To her, that's a plus: herbs can have fewer unpleasant side-effects than drugs.

Both Librach and Fiore believe that women should get to know their cycles before seeking fertility treatments.

Many couples try to conceive all month, unaware of their "fertile window" of only about five to seven days. Others focus their efforts around day 14, although fertile times varies from woman to woman, and even from cycle to cycle.

The "day 14 myth" is a throwback to the old calendar rhythm method, explains Rosemary Heron of Ontario's Natural Family Planning Association. Though it's often associated with Catholicism and preventing conception, the group can help any couple that's trying to conceive.

"You want to time when you try according to your menstrual cycle," Librach says. "The best natural way to determine when you're ovulating is to look for changes in your cervical mucous [CM]. It becomes thin, like the consistency of an egg white."

Some fertility-awareness methods involve daily temperature-taking and hormone tests, but Heron believes that monitoring your CM is the simplest way to go.

"If a woman writes down what her body is doing on a daily basis, she has a really good picture of where her fertility stands," she says.

For instance, a woman may discover she's infertile because she's ovulating too early, or not producing enough good-quality CM around ovulation. After tracking several cycles, she can share these insights with any practitioner, Heron says.

Fiore uses acupuncture to improve CM production. "That nice fertile mucous is a good indication of better egg quality – their lining's probably better."

Acupuncture may also improve IVF and intra-uterine insemination [IUI] pregnancy rates, says Librach.

Fiore adds, "Of all the alternative therapies, acupuncture is probably the most able to be studied via the scientific method… Other alternative therapies are not so cut and dried."

But there's a lot more to fertility than meets the eye. "If it was just a matter of sticking sperm and egg together, [IVF] really should have a 100 per cent success rate," she adds.

Juvent 1000
Dynamic Motion Therapy
the Non-Drug Treatment for Osteoporosis

Approved by Health Canada as a safe and effective therapy for osteoporosis

- Prevents and reverses bone loss
- Reduces risk of spinal hip fractures
- Excellent alternative for those unable or unwilling to take osteoporosis medication
- Non-invasive, less costly than long-term drug therapy
- Gentle in its repetitive vertical movement
- Only requires 20 minutes a day
- Simple, mobile and safe to use in the privacy of your home
- Backed by 15 years of research and clinical trials

How Juvent Dynamic Motion Therapy works!
Using fast, gentle vertical accelerations, the Juvent DMT platform stimulates bones in the same way your muscles did when you were younger. As you age, the muscular stimulation, which puts micro-stresses on your bones and causes them to respond by making more and stronger bone, diminishes. The Juvent 1000 supplies that lost stimulation, helping promote bone growth and increasing your bone density by an average of 1-2% a year.

New technology speeds up dental procedures

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Going to the dentist for certain forms of tooth reconstruction has traditionally been a bit of an arduous process.

For example, with a crown, the dentist would take an impression, put in an awkward temporary filler and then you'd have to return for another visit for the crown to be inserted.

Fortunately, a new technique called Cerec restorations is enabling dentists to do all of this work in less than two hours.

"With Cerec, instead of taking the impression, we take a three-dimensional photo of the tooth and use this photograph to design the crown on the computer," says Dr. Jack Slome of the Accolade Dental Centre.

"The crown is then milled from a block of porcelain and fitted into the mouth right away."

"It saves time and the patients love it," he says, adding that Cerec can also be used for such dental work as veneers and onlays.

New technology has made a variety of other dental procedures quicker.

For example, tooth whitening, which Slome says is quite popular, used to be done over a two-week period, whereas it is now a one-stop visit.

"Instead of having to wear trays overnight for two weeks, you can now spend an hour or two in the chair wearing the tray and you walk out with whitened teeth," the dentist reveals.

"X-rays are now digital," says Slome, who has been a practising dentist for more than 20 years.

"This is beneficial because digital X-rays are better for dentists to view, and they also don't expose patients to as much radiation."

Slome adds that in the coming year, Ontario may join other provinces in bringing in three-dimensional X-rays, which he says will enhance the viewpoints dentists have when examining the images.

When it comes to caring for your teeth and protecting your gums, Slome advises regular brushing and flossing.

What's made these time-tested methods of oral care more effective today are advances such as electric toothbrushes.

Electric brushes help avoid these problems.

Dr. Jack Slome with Cerec

"Electric toothbrushes work very well and brush correctly," he says.

"And the quality of toothpaste has also improved."

Slome encourages people to realize the health benefits of good dental hygiene and in particular, the importance of preventing gum disease.

"There is a correlation between gum disease and some major health issues, like heart disease and diabetes," he says.

"So a stronger understanding of the relationship between your gums and your health is important."

Smooth the Years Away

Dr. Stephen Kraft

What can Botox® do for you?

Botox®, which is marketed as Botox Cosmetic® for cosmetic purposes, is a muscle-relaxing agent that has proven to be a safe and effective ally in the battle against the aging face. It smoothes out forehead wrinkles, frown lines (which can create an angry facial expression), crow's feet, and lines around the upper lip, and it can relax prominent neck cords. In addition, Botox® significantly reduces excessive underarm sweating.

What does the treatment involve?

Botox® is injected into a few points either in the skin or in the muscles under the skin. It takes less than 15 minutes to perform, and patients can resume their daily activities right away. Significant improvement is usually seen within a week, and the best result appears after a few weeks.

ACCREDITATION: Dr. Stephen Kraft is one of Canada's Botox® pioneers. In 1985, he became the first doctor in Ontario to use Botox®. Dr. Kraft has authored or co-authored more than a dozen publications on Botox®, and has lectured on that subject to Ophthalmologists, Family Physicians, Optometrists, Neurologists, and Allied Health Personnel.

Space-age device may say 'buzz off' to osteoporosis

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

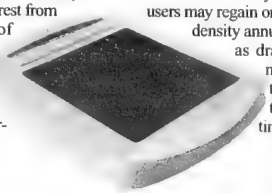
Buzzzzz. It's not a sound that comes to mind when you think of osteoporosis, but maybe it should be.

The newest buzz in town – it's actually a very quiet hum – comes from the Juvent 1000 Dynamic Motion Therapy vibrating platform.

The device is not much bigger than a bathroom scale, but when used for 20 minutes a day, the Juvent shows promise in keeping osteoporosis at bay over the long term. Just stand upright on it and do anything – read a book, watch television, listen to music – while tiny vibrations (not much wider than a few human hairs) move you gently up and down.

If this sounds a little too close to the 1950s-era vibrating "fitness machines" for credibility, consider the fact that the device was originally designed for the NASA space program to benefit astronauts who lose bone density while in space. There has also been serious interest from the U.S. National Institutes of Health (NIH) and the U.S. Army.

"There have been 86 peer-reviewed articles," says Christine Woodside of OsTek Orthopaedics, the Oakville company that is Juvent's exclusive Canadian distributor. "It all comes from a science background." The vibrations stimulate muscle and bone in the same ways that vigorous load-bearing activity does in younger people.



Juvent vibrating platform

Currently marketed around the world, the Juvent 1000 is not yet available for sale in the United States itself.

"It's approved in most developed countries," says Woodside, including Canada. However, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration requires larger, longer-term studies, such as one $4.8-million Harvard University project recently initiated and funded by the NIH.

Another study is under way at the University of Toronto under Dr. Angela Cheung, associate director of the University Health Network's women's health program and director of its osteoporosis program. She's recruiting 120 healthy post-menopausal women who can help her identify the effects, if any, of long-term Juvent 1000 use.

"The technology is promising," says Cheung. "That's why we're doing this study… we need to study it in a larger group in vigorous ways." Participants must not have osteoporosis, or be taking bone medications or hormone replacement. (To take part, call 416-340-4800, ext. 8601.)

Cheung says that while the most sensationalistic reports suggest the Juvent will replace medications, "drugs have a way higher magnitude of change… there are people who should be on medications."

If the Juvent 1000 proves effective, she feels it will probably be most helpful in preventing osteoporosis in people who don't have it yet. "If this helps people to prevent bone loss, then it makes sense."

Says Woodside, "there is a belief that you need to treat [bone loss] with drugs… I'm not against drugs. There are good drugs coming out that build bone better."

In fact, she adds, a recent Irish study looked at the effectiveness of using the Juvent 1000 along with Fosamax, a drug used to treat osteoporosis, and found dramatic bone increase.

But drugs may not always be necessary, especially in younger people – men and women – with osteopenia, a condition that often leads to full osteoporosis. While doctors often recommend drugs immediately, many patients dislike the idea of adopting a drug regimen that will last the rest of their lives.

"Others have been on drugs and don't find the results are that good," says Woodside. Or "they read publications that indicate negative side effects, and want to get off them."

As well, some people have started taking drugs but don't tolerate them well due to gastrointestinal issues.

Woodside calls the Juvent 1000 "a treatment for the next 10 to 15 years of your life." Regular users may regain one to two per cent of bone density annually, which, although not as dramatic as drug therapy, may be sufficient to counteract the slow destruction that occurs naturally over time.

Woodside says she often hears from users, and recently received a holiday card from a patient in her 70s: "I wish to thank you again for all your help… My Juvent 1000 has really improved the way I feel – physically, but in my spirit as well. It's great having this alternative to drugs."

Children with Crohn's disease who take Prednisone, a steroid drug that can cause osteoporosis, may be at risk, and the NIH is conducting a study at Children's Hospital of Philadelphia on the effects of the Juvent 1000 in this group.

Other potential uses for the Juvent 1000 include as a therapy for children with cerebral palsy, and for aiding circulation in post-surgical patients and those with diabetes.

"My husband has Type 2 diabetes," says Woodside. "He uses the unit to improve the circulation in his extremities."

Sharing the device with one or two family members can also help justify the $3,000 purchase price. There's no insurance coverage for the Juvent 1000 yet, says Woodside, but if a doctor recommends the platform, it can be claimed as a medical device for income tax purposes.

Other types of vibrating device have been marketed as fitness aids, both to clubs and home users, and some may make similar health claims. But these machines actually vibrate at a much higher frequency – one that can potentially damage bone, muscle and cartilage. "This is the only Health Canada approved device for treatment of osteoporosis," says Woodside.

For more information, visit Juvent's website at www.juvent.com or contact OsTek at 905-845-2961, or toll-free from outside the Toronto area at 866-406-2961.

Pilates instructor fights arthritis

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF

Nearly 100,000 Canadians are diagnosed with arthritis annually.

First diagnosed with psoriatic-arthritis as a teenager, Weisbrod has spent most of her adult life fighting pain and frustration.

According to the Arthritis Society, the condition causes swelling and pain in and around the joints and also affects tendons and ligaments.

"At 18, I was put in a hospital for a month and told I would be in a wheelchair within 10 years," Weisbrod said. "It was devastating to think of that as my future. It took me a long time to wrap my mind around dealing with a disability and with changes in my body physically."

There is no known cure, but recent improvements in medication have helped mitigate Weisbrod's pain somewhat.

Thankfully, the wheelchair prediction never materialized, but that's partly due to the proactive measures Weisbrod has taken, and to her indomitable spirit.

Weisbrod made the best of it and became a cosmetic consultant for the elderly and people with disabilities instead.

Due to the progressive nature of her arthritis, a continuing life of physical obstacles and hardships followed. But instead of crying, Weisbrod shifted focus once again, discovering a new passion: Pilates.

In 2001, she attended her first class in the gentle exercise method known as Pilates and became hooked.

The feeling of well-being that washed over her after the classes also opened her eyes to the potential benefits of the program for all arthritis sufferers.

"If you had asked me five years ago if I would be in the fitness industry, I would have laughed you out of the room," she said.

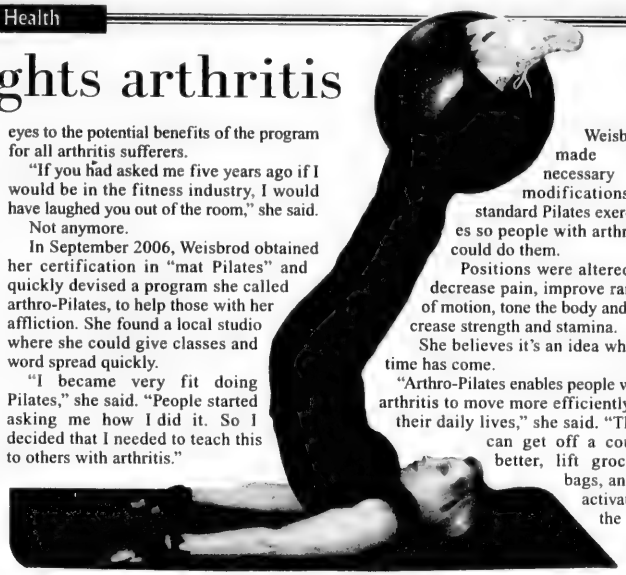
In September 2006, Weisbrod obtained her certification in "mat Pilates" and quickly devised a program she called arthro-Pilates, to help those with her affliction. She found a local studio where she could give classes and word spread quickly.

"I became very fit doing Pilates," she said. "People started asking me how I did it. So I decided that I needed to teach this to others with arthritis."



Weisbrod made the necessary modifications to standard Pilates exercises so people with arthritis could do them.

Positions were altered to decrease pain, improve range of motion, tone the body and increase strength and stamina.

She believes it's an idea whose time has come.

"Arthro-Pilates enables people with arthritis to move more efficiently in their daily lives," she said. "They can get off a couch better, lift grocery bags, and it activates the pelvic floor, which helps with urogenital functions."

Weisbrod acknowledges that many with the disease find it intimidating to attend "regular" Pilates classes, because they're self-conscious about their limited abilities or their physical appearance.

"I bring that comfort level to them, because I've been through it and I understand," she said.

Understand is an understatement.

Over the years, Weisbrod has undergone 13 surgeries. She has had wrist fusions, joint replacements on her hands and feet, her jaw set and her knees repaired.

"It's been a journey," she said.

But she is certain that arthro-Pilates is one of the answers to stave off despondency about it all, for her and for others.

"I'm a survivor, a fighter. So [through Pilates] I found a way to do what I needed to and not give up," she said.

She believes the timing is also perfect for a certain demographic.

"Baby boomers… are aging with arthritis," she said. "They can't always pound it out on the treadmill anymore. They need to find a gentle, yet effective, means to stay fit."

Weisbrod hopes to introduce arthro-Pilates to the masses and make it a household name in 2007.

Israeli technology battles fat

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Toronto's Cosmedicare clinic is the first in North America to make use of a new Israeli technology that is revolutionizing the way people look.

It's called Accent, and it may be the answer to stubborn cellulite deposits, fat that lies between the surface of the skin and the muscle beneath.

Often likened to an "orange peel" in texture, cellulite zones are an esthetic nightmare for many people.

Manufactured by Israeli cosmetic technology giant, Alma Lasers, the Accent machine uses radiofrequency waves (RF), to heat targeted areas of cellulite in a person's body.

It does so in two stages.

The first part of treatment uses a unipolar RF generator to metabolize fat cells up to 15 millimetres deep, causing them to shrink and drain.

The second relies on a bipolar RF to attack the shallower levels of fat two millimetres under the epidermis.

The result is smoother, tighter areas of skin.

But that doesn't mean men can't seek treatment as well.

"Cellulite targets mainly women's thighs, buttocks and hips. But on men it's more on the face, for jowls and double chins," she said.

A typical treatment session generally takes a half hour to an hour to complete and clients receive anywhere from four to 12 sessions, spaced two weeks apart, depending on their cellulite density.

Another bonus to the technology is that it is non-invasive and painless.

The device generally heats the fat to a temperature between 40 and 45 degrees Celsius.

"All I felt was some warmth, but I was never uncomfortable," said Maria Cooper, a cosmetics consultant and patient at Cosmedicare.

Cooper volunteered to undergo a live treatment on her abdomen for this story.

When it was done, the only evidence that a cellulite treatment had been performed was a slightly reddened complexion on her stomach.

"There's no down time with this treatment," Cooper said. "Patients can go back to their daily activities right away. The process is so gentle, I even fell asleep once."

The patient lies down on a bed, the desired skin area is exposed and then covered in baby oil, to help conduct the RF and facilitate the vigorous rubbing motion necessary of the Accent apparatus.

In fact, the greatest risk appears to be to the estheticians, who have to keep up a strenuous back and forth motion in order to evenly disperse the heat on a client's body.

The device was approved by Health Canada in 2005, but approval is pending by the Food and Drug Administration in the United States.

Still, prospective users of the technology should be aware that the Accent treatment is not a one-shot cure for cellulite.

Fat deposits do reaccumulate over time in a body.

That's why estheticians and dermatologists insist that patients be aware they have a part to play as well.

"It's not like if you stop the treatment all the [cellulite] comes back right away," Maresky said. "But nutrition, lifestyle and exercise all are important for maintenance. It all goes hand in hand."

Improving fertility

Last February, more than two years into their journey, the couple finally conceived their son, Spencer, who is now three months old.

"I don't care how people get pregnant," says Fiore. "I just want to see them with babies… I will even say, 'The way things are going, you should probably try IVF.'"

Pereira said she's gained a healthy skepticism about the typical cascade of fertility treatments.

"Don't just take… a doctor's word that you have to go from one drug to another. Look at all of your options," she says.

"We can use western and eastern medicine together… I don't think there's just one way."

Lifestyle manager offers hands-on support to get in shape

By MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

While many people have the motivation to join a gym, the drive to actually go there and work out effectively is another story.

That's why an emerging option is to seek out professionals who provide hands-on support with getting you in shape.

For instance, Equilibrium Lifestyle Management provides customized health and wellness programs for people in a personalized, one-on-one format.

Lifestyle managers from the company offer a blend of personal training, nutrition counselling and stress-reduction techniques.

A qualified medical director approves all programs.

"We go to your home, office, cottage or with you to the gym. We come right to your door so you don't have an excuse not to exercise," says Leah Epstein, Equilibrium's founder and owner.

The lifestyle managers start off by looking at how clients are presently balancing life and then develop a plan to incorporate health and wellness into it.

"You need to make a training plan with realistic goals so that it is sustainable," says Epstein, noting the company provides services throughout Toronto, Ottawa and Muskoka.

"If someone works out for even half an hour three times a week, it's better than if they promised themselves to work out six times a week and didn't meet that goal."

Epstein notes that one of the biggest obstacles that prevents people from exercising regularly and eating well is lack of time.

There are only so many hours in the day, and with the demands of work and family, it's often challenging to make it to the gym or prepare a healthy, home-cooked meal.

"I recently worked with a woman who owns her own company and was eating a lot of ordered food because she was busy," Epstein says. "It was unrealistic for me to tell her to cook her own meals every day, so we came up with a plan to cook her meals on the weekend and make healthier order-in choices."

Because the woman's workday was so hectic, Epstein trained her at 6 a.m. and the results have been significant.

"She lost weight and got stronger," Epstein says.

The specific exercises you do also need to be realistic and cater to your needs. For instance, Epstein points out the importance of multi-joint exercises that focus on the various parts of the body you use regularly.

"Multi-joint exercises mimic the muscles and joints you use every day, which makes you stronger and helps reduce injury in your everyday lifestyle," she says.

"For example, at the gym, some people do leg extensions on a machine, but when in life do you move your leg that way? Instead, do some squats or lunges because that's how your body really does move."

Making lifestyle changes is a process that takes time, so be patient, reward yourself for making progress and recognize how you're helping yourself, Epstein advises.

"When you reach a physical goal, whether it's working out three times a week or running a five-kilometre race, reward yourself for it," she says.

"And remember that exercise is a great way to reduce stress. Don't turn to food or have drinks when you're stressed. Rather, focus on the positive things and go out there and exercise."

Centre sets achievable goals for kids with autism

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Neurologist Myra Sourkes realized that something was wrong with her son David by the time he was 11 months old.

"He had a blank look and did not look at us," she says.

At 15 months, the David was diagnosed as having autism, and the family began a behavioural-based intervention program offered through the Montreal Children's Hospital. David had delayed language development and did not begin to speak until the age of four.

Autism is a neurological disorder, but the cause is unknown. It affects the development of communication and social interaction skills, and boys are affected more often than girls in a ratio of approximately four to one. While there are some characteristics common to most people with this disorder, the difficulties they face vary from person to person and range from mild to severe.

Research indicates that the incidence of autism is increasing. According to a study in the Journal of the American Medical Association in January 2003, more than one in 300 children are affected. More recent statistics indicate a rate of one in 166. This is three or four times higher than incidence rates reported 30 years ago and suggests that autism diagnosis is increasing at a faster rate than that of other disabilities.

In 1998, David and his family moved to Toronto. "At that time, services for children in Toronto were better, and David would not have to face the obstacle of a second language," Sourkes says.

Before coming to Toronto, she heard from a friend that the New Haven Learning Centre, a private, non-profit treatment and education centre for children with autism, was being developed in Toronto. It opened in 1998 with six children. Five years later, there were 25 children ranging in age from two to 18. There are now 40 students.

The Sourkes family applied to New Haven when David was seven years old, and after four years, David was accepted in 2002. Meanwhile, David attended special education classes at a public school and the family provided home-based behavioural intervention.

Teaching at New Haven is based on Applied Behaviour Analysis (ABA), which breaks learning down into basic steps that are taught on a one-to-one basis, for 30 to 40 hours a week.

Empirical research indicates that treatment and education strategies based upon the principles of ABA are effective interventions for several disorders, including autism, phobias, addictions and learning disabilities.

"This ABA approach is a child's best hope at overcoming many of the devastating symptoms of autism," says Diane Uslaner, New Haven's executive director. "The quality of life of a child and of the family, is dependent upon access to these vital services."

Uslaner notes that the centre does not receive any direct funding from the government. "The annual cost per child is $55,000. New Haven raises funds for tuition assistance."

Sophie, Countess of Wessex, the royal patron of the New Haven Learning Centre for children with autism, is seen with David, a 15-year-old student at the school.

Sourkes says independent living for David is a major goal of her family. "At New Haven, the staff loves the students because they have chosen to [work there] and they are incredibly enthusiastic.

"The school is extremely structured and breaks down the elements of learning a particular skill or piece of information in small units so that the goals are achievable."

Living with a child who has autism is difficult for every member of the family, she says, adding that "New Haven is very supportive… They have a home program – they come to the home and help the parents develop functional activities, plan leisure programming, develop techniques such as dressing and grooming and help their students become independent at home."

She adds that in addition to the individualized programming, the school also uses group teaching to help students acquire skills of daily living, setting long-term as well as short-term goals. The staff may focus, for example, on teaching the skills needed to get a job.

Uslaner notes that New Haven has an annual gala and receives corporate support. "New Haven's goal is to try not to turn people away due to financial constraints.

"We are presently exploring possibilities for a residential facility for older students and for young adults."

For more information about New Haven, call 416-259-4445 or contact the centre at newhaven@bellnet.ca.

Jewish mysticism can help achieve 'robust health'

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

I did as I was asked: I sent Annette Poizner, a certified graphologist and social worker, a sample of my handwriting, my 10 earliest memories, and two detailed drawings of trees.

"Based on this, she thinks she's going to be able to assess my personality?" I asked my skeptical self.

A week later, I met with Poizner in her North York office, eager to hear what conclusions she had reached based on my chicken scratch and juvenile drawings.

"You, you're a girlie-girl," said Poizner with a laugh.

Drawing on key concepts in Kabbalah, she explained that all psychological attributes can be placed on a continuum, with some traits, such as dynamic and forward-moving as masculine, and other traits, such as introverted and detail-oriented as feminine. She added that most of my personality traits fall into the feminine end of the spectrum.

Annette Poizner

"I'm a girlie-girl?" I asked in disbelief. I grew up as an athletic tomboy, obsessed with the Toronto Maple Leafs and always at ease around a group of guys. I was not comfortable with that label.

Sensing my skepticism, she asked me to give her a chance to elaborate and hoped that the projective personality assessment – a method that allows clinicians to learn about a subject's personality by analyzing his or her drawings, handwriting, earliest memories or other behaviours– would help demonstrate the value of Jewish wisdom as a means of providing guidance to people.

She began by providing background information about Jewish mysticism.

"Any discussion about Jewish mysticism has to be grounded in classic texts, in ideas that are part of our mainstream that integrate absolutely harmoniously with traditional Jewish ideas," said Poizner, who has a doctorate in counselling psychology from the University of Toronto, a master's in social work from Columbia University and did a doctoral dissertation exploring the use of graphology (handwriting analysis) within psychotherapy.

"In Genesis, God said that it is not good for man to be alone. At which point, he takes the rib [from Adam to create Eve] and suddenly we have this bifurcation, which has a man and woman standing separate side by side," she said, adding that mystics believe the whole world is composed of two complimentary systems.

In fact, Poizner said, native medicine, traditional Chinese medicine, the Yogic tradition and Jewish mysticism all share the assumption that the body also has this duality of nature – yin and yang, or feminine and masculine – and balancing the masculine and feminine energies promotes robust health.

The challenge is figuring out how to create unity between the masculine and feminine, otherwise we will be of two minds, said Poizner, who specializes in treating patients with obsessive compulsive disorder using psychotherapy, hypnosis and other techniques.

Throughout our session, Poizner frequently referred to the kabbalistic Tree of Life, a map made up of circles and lines that depicts the body as a system of "sfirot" (energy centres) that govern different limbs and organs, and channel energy down from a heavenly source.

She said the system runs optimally when all the energy centres are enlivened and nourished by a balanced, active lifestyle.

When the system is unbalanced, an individual can experience confusion, indecision, moodiness, and even physical ailments.

According to Poizner, this ancient map can help people better understand their imbalances and determine which of their psychological attributes need to be tamed and which need to be developed or strengthened.

Jewish mysticism offers a map of the psyche that can help people achieve a healthy psychological balance without attributing negative disorders to the symptoms, she said.

For instance, in my case, based on the information Poizner gathered from my handwriting and earliest memories, she was able to conclude that my tendency to procrastinate is what hinders me from moving forward in life.

Whether I'm hitting the snooze button on my alarm clock in the morning or checking my e-mail before I start working on an assignment, this behaviour suggests that my map lacks "chesed," or loving kindness, the masculine sfirah that gives us the energy and discipline to move forward.

Instead, I apparently possess too much of its opposite, gvurah – which means strength or might – the feminine sfirah that "relates to the experience of fear, a trend toward contraction."

Poizner, who regularly speaks at various synagogues – most recently at Temple Emanu-El in Toronto – has also lectured undergraduate Judaic studies students at Queen's University about graphology and its correspondence with Jewish mystical teachings.

She said she uncovered the association between Jewish doctrine and handwriting assessment many years after she studied handwriting analysis in the 1980s with graphologist Baruch Lazewnik in Israel, where graphology is widely used and accepted by clinicians, although not endorsed by the psychology profession.

But, she said, there is a growing interest among other health-care professionals in what she calls "medical anthropology," which includes graphology and the study of spirituality.

In 2002, the Continuing School of Education at the University of Toronto's medical school hosted a conference called the Second Canadian Inter-professional Conference on Spirituality and Health Care, where Poizner spoke about the use of Jewish wisdom in psychotherapy.

Seven years ago, Poizner launched the Jewish Health Alliance, which produces programs and lectures about Judaism and the healing arts.

"We are getting some mileage in terms of getting Judaism out there as a very credible lens through which to think about the healing arts," she said.

She hopes that the programming will "rescue Jewish mysticism from the celebrities and from sources that have been questionable."

Combining her expertise in Judaism and psychology with her knowledge of graphology and Jewish mysticism, Poizner was able to analyze my handwriting, my drawings and my memories to determine things about myself that only close friends and family know.

"You're an introvert with a very strong interest in human connection, meaning on one hand you're emotionally reserved and withdrawn, and you come to life in the one-on-one," Poizner said.

"When you go to party, you have to boot up all your energy to flutter around and talk to a million people. But to sit one on one with a close friend, you feel energized. You are practical and realistic, grounded, good at organizing the tangible world, detailed."

Poizner said that while I am intelligent and have a "wide bouquet of attributes and talents," I tend to doubt my competence, which may hinder me from moving forward.

I am perfectly competent, but don't feel it. I am a naysayer, a pessimist, she said.

Apparently, my map is not balanced and I'm too yin. So, it's true. I am a girlie-girl. But there is hope.

Using the kabbalistic tree of life, by understanding the map and determining what areas need to be improved, anyone can pursue robust health.

"You can do all this stuff and never talk about Jewish mysticism, but there are far more intricacies that come out when you use the map."

Poizner will present a lecture titled "Kabbalah and the Psychology of Handwriting" at the Lodzer Centre Congregation on Feb. 11 at 8 p.m.

Tickets are $10. For more information, call 416-636-6665 or visit www.annettepoizner.com.

Israeli-made scooters erase wheelchair stigma

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Bryan Krikst finishes folding and unfolding one of his company's electric scooters, looks up and says, "It's just that simple."

Krikst, president of ActiveLite Mobility Systems Inc. in Richmond Hill, is justifiably proud of his product.

ActiveLite is the exclusive Canadian distributor of personal mobility aids manufactured by Israel's Tzora Active Systems, a kibbutz-run company.

They're designed for portability, durability and ease of use for people whose mobility is limited by infirmity or age.

It takes Krikst all of 10 seconds to demonstrate the ease with which the scooters compact.

And he barely stoops while doing it.

"It's perfect for people who have issues with bending," he said.

The scooters, which come in a range of sizes, colours and design, all have one thing in common: they're built to bust the wheelchair stigma.

"It's unfortunate," Krikst said. "You don't want to be pleased by the fact that there are people with mobility limitations. But what you can do is offer an alternative that doesn't shout out: 'I'm disabled!' like a wheelchair does."

He said clients feel liberated when using the scooters.

"A lot of people will see a wheelchair before they see a person," he said. "These [scooters] look like gizmos. People who are in the process of coming to terms with the fact that they have [limited] mobility… this can offer them a great deal of freedom and independence. It makes a big difference."

"We have representatives in every major city centre in Canada who demonstrate how the scooters work," Krikst said. "And they're happy to do it."

The typical scooter has a battery range that lasts for about 13 kilometres and weighs between 42 and 66 pounds when fully assembled.

The scooters also disassemble easily and can be stored in almost any car trunk, with no one piece weighing more than 30 pounds.

The scooter frames are made with tube steel so that they're lightweight.

It's a product whose time has come, Krikst said.

The company was born out of his history with Israel.

While attending university in Johannesburgh in 1967, Krikst, a South African native, heeded Israel's call for volunteers to help out on kibbutzim because of the spectre of war.

"A lot of people went from South Africa to volunteer," he said. "I stayed in Israel from June to November 1967."

While there, Krikst worked mostly on Kibbutz Tzora.

Over the years, he remained in close contact with the kibbutz, and 35 years later, revisited it.

In January 2002, Krikst went back to Israel on what he calls a "personal solidarity trip" when he saw that tourism was down because of the intifadah.

To his delight, he discovered Tzora was manufacturing lightweight scooters to help people and felt so sure of their product, he incorporated ActiveLite in March 2002.

He abandoned his former life in computer software development and ran ActiveLite out of his own home, before moving to bigger offices shortly afterwards.

The family-run business took off, and Krikst now finds himself having to rent new warehouse space yet again, as orders pile up and Tzora expands its product lines.

"Demand is growing," he said. "The market will be going into a growth phase, and we expect it to grow by double-digits over the next few years."

ActiveLite makes an effort to lend its scooters out to those who need them the most.

"We're a corporate donor with the War Amps of Canada," Krikst said. "And we have exposed the product to the Multiple Sclerosis Society, the Parkinson's Society [and] to stroke victims."

And as he watches market trends, Krikst predicts one sector will soon benefit most from his scooters.

"The big market are the baby boomers who are [approaching] the age where they will have limited mobility," he said.

To meet the predicted demand, ActiveLite plans to offer more choice and continue collaborating with Tzora in the future.

THORNE MILL
ON STEELES
A SUNRISE SENIOR LIVING COMMUNITY

Sunrise Senior Living New Location: Thorne Mill on Steeles for Independent Living

For seniors who deserve a unique alternative to nursing homes, Sunrise Senior Living has offered the best care and comforts since 1981. Sunrise homes, over 420 throughout the world, are aging-in-place communities; staff are chosen and services designed to accommodate high functioning.

Thorne Mill on Steeles offers independent living for seniors who want to maintain a rich, rewarding life without running a household. It's ideal for an active senior who wants to focus on the things that matter most, but have assistance available at need.

To maintain seniors' independence and dignity in the lifestyle they're used to, Thorne Mill on Steeles begins by identifying each resident's individual needs. Residents don't just feel at home, they are at home. If you're looking at nursing homes and retirement communities for yourself or a loved one, explore the options and amenities at Thorne Mill on Steeles.

Independent living is the privacy and freedom of home, with the convenience and security of on-call assistance. This is what you're offered at Thorne Mill on Steeles. Here, one can age in place, with ready access to the different levels of care one might need up to and including end of life.

Active seniors have lifestyle choices. There's a full schedule of activities, including fitness and wellness programs; a selection of meal plans; and options for personalized services. For seniors who want partial support, assisted living options are available.

A prospective Thorne Mill on Steeles tenant might be 75 to 85 years old. He or she is active, able to enjoy shopping or such sports as golf; an involved grandparent, possibly even still with part-time business or professional interests, or working as a volunteer.

Thorne Mill on Steeles is a 12-storey building. The majority of its suites, 180, are dedicated to independent living, and 13 to assisted living. There are 26 Reminiscence suites for those with Alzheimer's, and 13 Terrace Club units for those in early phases of Alzheimer's or dementia.

At Thorne Mill on Steeles, each independent-living suite has a full kitchen with five appliances. There's a choice of floor plans, with one-bedroom, two-bedroom and studio suites; and some have a balcony or den.

The monthly rent covers two meals per day, weekly housekeeping and all daily activities. You can choose to have two meals daily in the fine dining room, or prepare your own meals in your kitchen. Dining room meals can also be used for your family and guests.

Every Thorne Mill on Steeles resident has access to the library and lounge areas; also to the pool, spa, sauna, hot tub and state-of-the-art exercise room. Also, there's a bistro and bar.

Thorne Mill on Steeles has a community bus, with outings organized for the residents. Also, there's a town car with a chauffeur. For those who drive, underground parking is included in the rent.

Thorne Mill on Steeles is located on Steeles Ave. West, halfway between Bathurst and Yonge, in Thornhill. This home has easy access to the best this area has to offer: culture, shopping, community centres and more are all right here. Whether you enjoy the order of a well-organized day, or living at your own tempo, you'll feel at home

Thorne Mill on Steeles is high-end, but very good value for what you pay. Come in and visit; take the tour, and discuss it. Director of sales and marketing is Jill Wetstein. Phone 647-222-5615; and visit the website at www.sunriseseniorliving.ca <http://www.sunriseseniorliving.ca/>

Harper cheered at CIJA event

All federal party leaders declare their support for Israel

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The leaders of the Canadian political establishment expressed their strong support for Israel last week in addressing the parliamentary dinner that concluded the biennial, two-day conference of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA).

"Over the past year, we got a sharp reminder that it's one thing to offer supportive words to Israel when it's convenient… last summer we stood with our friends in the democratic family of nations, the State of Israel," Prime Minister Stephen Harper told a cheering capacity audience of some 1,000 people. "We stood by the commitment I made at your last dinner. Israel had a friend when it mattered, and that, my friends, is the only thing that really counts."

Referring to Israel's summer war with Hezbollah in Lebanon and ongoing attacks from Palestinian extremists, Harper added that a "battle between a democratic state and terrorist groups who seek to destroy it and its people is not a matter of shades of grey, it is a matter of right and wrong."

He repeated his government's call for "a fair and just future for the Palestinian people" predicated on the creation of a "viable, democratic Palestinian state that will live peacefully beside a secure, prosperous Israel."

But he cautioned that "the road to this much-needed state will not be paved with the blood of the victims of terror."

He concluded by adding that "when faced with threats [from terrorists, extremists and fanatics], Israel will always have a steadfast friend in Canada's new government."

Also emphasizing the relationship between Canada and Israel as being one between sister democracies, Liberal leader Stéphane Dion said that "when Israel's right to exist is threatened, it is an attack on the values of every democracy. In this way, Israel's fight for existence is our fight. Her struggle for peace and security is our struggle."

Referring to the biblical axiom,

Families of abducted soldiers work to keep hope alive

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's been seven months since Israeli soldiers Ehud (Udi) Goldwasser and Eldad Regev were snatched from their border post and kidnapped by Hezbollah.

A battle was fought over the brazen July 12 abduction, which also killed eight Israeli soldiers and, it is believed, wounded Goldwasser and Regev. Despite the deaths, a UN resolution mandating the solders' unconditional return, negotiations for a prisoner exchange and the pleas of the soldiers' families, very little has changed since that day in July.

A third Israeli soldier, Gilad Shalit, was captured in Israel near Gaza on June 25 and taken to unknown locations in the Palestinian territory.

Last week, the Goldwasser and Regev families again called on Hezbollah to exchange prisoners, or at the very least, provide some information about the soldiers' fates. To date, Hezbollah has refused to permit the Red Cross to even visit the prisoners.

Ehud Goldwasser

Eldad Regev

Gilad Shalit

"Right now, there is no news about their condition, if they're alive at all. We don't know," said Benny Regev, Eldad's brother, on the phone from Israel. "This is the situation since the day of their kidnapping. There is no progress in the knowledge of the families.

"When the [UN] resolution was decided, we hoped that would improve [our] knowledge and they would [be] released immediately. It didn't happen."

Instead, the families are left to raise questions and "to hope. This is what we have, hope," he said.

CANADA

Shoah Motion Passed

WINNIPEG — Manitoba's ruling New Democratic Party passed a resolution at its annual convention earlier this month that condemned all forms of Holocaust denial. "I believe that we are the first political party in the world to pass such a resolution and it is my sincere hope that other political parties will join us," said Chris Melnick, the minister of water stewardship, who brought the resolution to the floor of the Feb. 4 convention. One week earlier, Melnick, who was elected in 2003 and represents a riding with few Jews, was in Israel with JNF Winnipeg emissary Rami Kleinmann to learn about water conservation efforts there. It was Melnick's third visit to the Jewish state.

Minister Apologizes

PORTLAND, Maine — The minister at a Maine church apologized for a newspaper ad touting a sermon titled "The only way to destroy the Jewish race." "Please forgive me for causing alarm in your hearts," Rev. Philip Andrukaitis of the South Portland Baptist Church said in a statement. The sermon was actually about fighting anti-Semitism and supporting Israel and Jews. The Portland Press Herald/Maine Sunday Telegram, which published the ad Feb. 3, also apologized and said new safeguards are in place to avoid a recurrence.

More U.S. Jews?

BOSTON — There are 20 per cent more Jews in the United States than previously thought, a new study says. Using data from government, academic and private groups, Brandeis University's Steinhardt Social Research Institute found there are 6 million to 6.4 million U.S. Jews, which disputes the 5.2-million figure in the United Jewish Communities' 2000-01 National Jewish Population Survey. That study, conducted by phone, undercounted non-Orthodox Jews and Jews under 55, the new study said.

Group Speaks Out

LONDON — A group of left-wing Anglo-Jewish intellectuals and celebrities urged Jews to take a more "independent" stance on Israel than mainstream community groups. In a statement Feb. 5 on a website linked to Britain's Guardian newspaper, the group Independent Jewish Voices called for equitable treatment of Israelis and Palestinians, and said anti-Arab bigotry is akin to anti-Semitism. The group, which includes actor Stephen Fry, film director Mike Leigh and playwright Harold Pinter, hinted at breaking from the umbrella Board of Deputies of British Jews, which has backed Israel in its conflicts with Hezbollah and the Palestinians. The group said that "the broad spectrum of opinion among the Jewish population of this country is not reflected by those institutions which claim authority to represent the Jewish community as a whole."

Oldest Survivor Dies

SYDNEY — Irma Stahler, the world's oldest Holocaust survivor, died in Sydney at 107. Born in Czechoslovakia, Stahler was sent to Theresienstadt in 1941 and spent the rest of the war in camps in Latvia and Germany. She never remarried after her husband died in the Shoah. After the war, she went to Sweden with her two daughters. They went to Australia in 1950.

School Expels Kids

VIENNA — A Jewish school in Vienna last week expelled the four children of a haredi man who attended a Shoah denial conference in Iran in December. Moshe Arye Friedman, a member of the anti-Zionist Neturei Karta sect, said he was told other schools won't take them. He plans to sue.

Billionaire Gives $25 Million To Birthright

Sheldon Adelson

NEW YORK — Billionaire Sheldon Adelson has pledged to give $25 million (US) to birthright israel every year for the foreseeable future.

The money will allow the organization to double the number of free trips to Israel that it offers Jewish youth this summer, bringing the total to 20,000.

The gift is being made by the Adelson Family Charitable Foundation, founded recently by the majority owner of the Las Vegas Sands Corp., and his wife, Miriam Adelson. A birthright spokesperson said the gifts will continue for the next several years, if the program's other funders, who contributed $51 million last year, maintain their levels of giving.

In December, the Adelson foundation gave $5 million to birthright to pay for 2,000 free trips for Jews aged 18 to 26. Adelson, whose net worth is estimated at $20.5 billion, is America's third wealthiest man behind Bill Gates and Warren Buffet. Birthright israel has a 38,000-name waiting list.

The program, which since 2000 has sent more than 120,000 young Jews from 51 countries to Israel, has been jointly funded by philanthropists, the Jewish Agency, the Israeli government and the North American federation system.

Ontario vote changed to avoid Shemini Atzeret

CJC applauds government move

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Ontario government has changed the date of the next provincial election to Oct. 10 in response to concerns from the Jewish community about a scheduling conflict with Shemini Atzeret.

Steven Shulman, Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario regional director, applauded last week's decision to move the date from Oct. 4, which had been set according to legislation mandating fixed election dates.

CJC had been in communication with Elections Ontario and the government for "quite a few months" to push for the date change, Shulman said.

The Election Act, amended in 2005, calls for provincial elections every four years on the first Thursday of October. This year, the vote was scheduled to fall on Oct. 4, the same day as Shemini Atzeret, which would have prevented observant Jews from voting or taking part in any type of electoral work.

However, the Election Act has a built-in provision allowing the chief election officer to recommend to the government a date change, within a window of seven days, if the original date falls on a day of "cultural or religious significance".

"It's important that the legislation has flexibility so that people can participate, not only from our community but from all communities at future times where there may be a conflict," Shulman said.

"I think [this decision] is more important than the Jewish community," Shulman added. "It's important in terms of indicating that the government is sensitive to the diversity in Ontario. And in fact the legislation was drafted to address the possibility of conflict with significant religious or cultural days. That's exactly what occurred here."

Lorie Wells, Ontario's assistant chief election officer, said Elections Ontario examined all seven days that follow Oct. 4 and decided that Oct. 10 was the next most appropriate day to hold the vote. She said the Jewish community's concerns were only one of the factors her agency considered in making its decision.

Steven Shulman

"We reached out and sent a questionnaire to a number of community and religious organizations and [Chief Election Officer John Hollins] received enough responses that he felt that Oct. 4 was a day of cultural and/or religious significance," Wells said.

Hollins then sent his recommendation to Ontario's lieutenant governor, James Bartleman, and the decision was taken in a cabinet meeting on Feb. 7.

The rescheduled date also bypasses Friday, Oct. 5, which is Simchat Torah, Saturday, Oct. 6, which is Shabbat and Monday, Oct. 8, which is Thanksgiving.

Marie Bountrogianni, the minister for democratic renewal, posted a statement on her ministry website heralding the news.

"October 4, 2007 is the Jewish holiday of Shemini Atzeret, during which members of the Orthodox Jewish community would not be able to vote," the statement said.

"It is important that our Election Act respond to the needs of Ontarians," Bountrogianni said. "Our fixed election date framework was designed with the flexibility to accommodate our cultural and religious diversity."

Where history informs coexistence

From the editor's desk

"In everything we do, we have our eyes on coexistence," Ruth Cheshin, the president of the Jerusalem Foundation told The CJN last month.

Cheshin's words echoed in my mind and fell like heavy stones in a deep, dark, empty well against the background of last weekend's hateful incitement against the Jews and Israel. Coexistence was very far from the minds of the Palestinian religious and political authorities who falsely accused Israel of trying to undermine the foundations of the Al-Aqsa Mosque.

Cheshin was dining with a small group of journalists who were in Jerusalem at the invitation of the Jerusalem Foundation to learn about the foundation and see some of its works and projects in the city.

We were having breakfast in the restaurant of fabled Mishkenot Sha'ananim, the first Jewish community built outside the walls of the Old City in the mid-19th century, the gift of Moses Montefiore to the Jews of Jerusalem. As he did so often, the British philanthropist responded to the summons of his heart.

His people needed help.

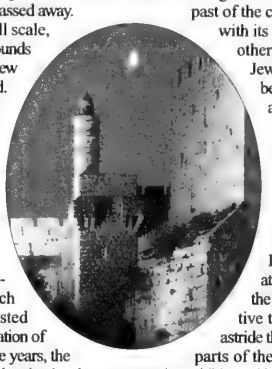
Who, if not he, as the words of the famous song proclaimed, would reach across the ocean to provide that help? In the harsh, hard-driven times and impoverishments of the Industrial Revolution, Montefiore, it can be said, was his own Jerusalem Foundation, helping to build the beloved city that had so long been at the centre of Jewish hopes and prayers.

Some one hundred years later, the city casting aside the razored edges and spiked thorns of the barbed wire that had divided it for some 19 years, its activist, visionary mayor, Teddy Kollek, decided he could not wait for the funds that neither the national government nor the city's taxpayers had in sufficient quantity to rebuild the newly reunited city.

Thus, he recruited a handful of generous, caring, Jerusalem-minded people – Jews and non-Jews – from all around the world to help rebuild the modern ancient city. He thus founded the non-profit Jerusalem Foundation.

"Now the work of the foundation must proceed without Teddy," Cheshin told us as the sun poured through the ceiling to floor windows on the eastern wall of the restaurant. She was referring to the fact that Kollek had just recently passed away.

"We started on a small scale, building parks and playgrounds in the neighbourhoods of new immigrants," Cheshin said. "We knew the playgrounds were a success because they were never vandalized. The Jerusalem Foundation was always there to deal with the emergencies of the city, the projects that were needed immediately."



One of the broad categories of projects in which the foundation has invested funds has been the preservation of the city's heritage. Over the years, the foundation helped open and maintain a large number of historical sites and archeological projects.

In the face of the protests orchestrated last week throughout the Arab world against the restoration work by Israel's Antiquities Authority at the Mugrabi Gate alongside the Western Wall, one can now make the case that a new emergency now confronts the people of Jerusalem.

Palestinian authorities have fomented the Mugrabi "crisis" precisely at this time to deflect attention away from Hamas-Fatah violence and to counter the impending celebrations of the 40th anniversary of the city's reunification.

Once again, the right of the Jews to undertake legitimate activities in the Old City of Jerusalem is being questioned. Once again, the right of Jews to claim a historical belonging to the Old City is being denied.

Jews belong to and in Jerusalem. No attempt at revising the city's history, however bullying and violent, will ever succeed in wiping away this tangible, millennial sense of belonging.

When the Jerusalem Foundation undertakes heritage-preservation projects for the sake of all religions in Jerusalem, the Jewish past of the city necessarily fuses with its present. It can be no other way because the Jewish past in the city becomes as ubiquitous and as evident as the sun that shines upon the city's stones.

One of the most educational and profoundly inspiring projects of the foundation is the Tower of David Museum. Situated at the Jaffa Gate of the Old City, the distinctive tower and citadel sit astride the northwestern ramparts of the city's outer wall. It contains exhibits, artifacts, archives and carefully preserved excavations.

From the roof of the museum, the wide panorama of Jerusalem opens on all sides. Its vista is exhilarating. The view it affords the visitor spans time and generations as much as it does distance and geography.

The museum tells the story of Jerusalem from its early Canaanite period to its very present. And those who visit with a heart open to the full truth of this magical place will learn about coexistence, too. They will see and then marvel at the efforts of Kollek and the foundation to make the city's past open and accessible to all peoples of good will.

CJPAC gala targets professionals 25 to 40

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) wants you. More specifically, they want youth.

The Toronto-based non-partisan, non-profit, grassroots Jewish advocacy group will host nearly 600 people at a gala downtown at the Dominion Club, One King W., at 8 p.m. on Feb. 22.

Designed to raise political awareness among young, professional Jews aged 25 to 40, the event, titled "action," is scheduled to be attended by various youthful MPs, MPPs and city councillors representing all political parties and all levels of government.

The gala will be structured as a "meet and greet," where guests can speak with politicians informally over the course of the evening while listening to a DJ and viewing live entertainment.

Josh Cooper, CJPAC's executive director, spoke to the CJN from Ottawa last week, where he led a team of 150 volunteers at a conference and prepared them to meet with federal ministers.

"These are people who have chosen on their own [time and money] to participate in an advocacy initiative," Cooper said. "Some of them have been engaged [with CJPAC] for a long time [and] others... just feel that it's their time to step up."

Cooper, 37, spoke strongly about the need to continue captivating the younger demographic.

"One of the biggest issues we have with this demographic... is that people are focused on getting their lives together after university," Cooper said. "The other key issue is knowledge. People don't realize how easy it is to get [politically] engaged."

To further entice youth, action will eschew stodgy protocols like speeches and formal attire, replacing them with an urban chic dress code, an open bar, over-the-top decor and a general fun atmosphere.

But CJPAC's underlying objectives remain firm.

"Our main goal is to engage the [younger] community in politics," Cooper said. "In the last election, we had literally hundreds of people working on 80 campaigns across eight provinces. People are getting engaged and that's really what the message is."

As a young, Jewish professional herself, she was inspired by Cooper's enthusiasm, youth and dedication to fostering Jewish advocacy among his contemporaries in Canada.

"It all stems from getting involved," she said. "There are so many traditional ways to get involved [with advocacy]. Writing a cheque is faceless. But this is a new and innovative event for CJPAC. We wanted something tangible and interactive."

Shemtov, Bram Belzberg and Jon Bloomberg, the other two action co-chairs, drafted the following statement, found on the back of every flyer for the upcoming event: "We support CJPAC because we believe that we all have a responsibility in securing the Jewish future. It is our political process that will help secure that future here and in a safe and democratic Israel."

Shemtov and her peers believe the chance to chat up MPs in a laid-back milieu will resonate with local Jewish youth and galvanize more political involvement as a result.

"We want people to come and have a great time," Shemtov said. "It's not going to be stuffy or threatening, it's going to be very relaxed. It's all about networking, meeting people and sharing ideas."

Cooper concurred.

"There will be plans to do this in other major community areas across the country," he said. "But more important than the event itself will be the followup activity afterwards and engaging these 600 people as new advocates. I think we're going to have a very strong group of future advocates."

Former Yiddish theatre may become heritage site

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Toronto city councillors are set to debate a recommendation this week from City Hall's heritage department to designate the former Standard Theatre at Dundas Street and Spadina Avenue – a once-thriving Yiddish venue that later became the Victory movie theatre and burlesque palace – as a heritage site worthy of limited preservation and protection.

Since its last theatrical incarnation as a Chinese movie house, the main floor of the building was converted into a bank. The current owners now seek to convert the upper floor, which has been closed for years, into office space. Amazingly, the once-resplendent, Art Deco-ish upper balcony has been preserved, although in a condition of dire neglect.

The building's rather nondescript exterior and lavish second-floor interior would be preserved if the site is designated a heritage site, according to Adam Vaughan, the area's councillor, who is championing the designation.

"It was a grand theatre, but only half remains," Vaughan said, adding that the owners have offered to install a "photo museum" of historic material on the second floor.

A heritage designation would require that any alterations "be done in a sensitive manner that would retain the most important features" of the site, said Brian Gallaugher, the city's outgoing heritage planning co-ordinator. "It can be converted, but in a way that respects the original function of the room, so that people would be able to recognize it was once a theatre."

Many notables from the Jewish community and the wider community attended the Standard's opening in 1922, an occasion graced by a bevy of Yiddish performers, singers and an orchestra. In exchange for the promise of discounted theatre tickets, many of the patrons who filled the 1,500-seat auditorium had assisted in the building's construction by buying bricks for $5 each.

Its architect was Benjamin Brown, whose other notable works include two Spadina office towers and the former Beth Jacob synagogue on Henry Street, which is now a Greek Orthodox church.

According to historian Stephen Speisman in his book The Jews of Toronto: A History to 1937, the Standard was the first purpose-built Yiddish theatre in Canada. With probably only a dash of hyperbole, historian Hye Bossin once called it "the finest Yiddish playhouse in North America and probably the world."

Maurice Schwartz, Molly Picon, Jacob Ben-Ami and the Adlers and Thomashefskies were among the great actors and acting families who trod its boards in such dramas as Jew Suss, Yoshe Kâlb, Sabbatai Zvi, The Brothers Ashkenazi and God, Man and the Devil.

Besides these serious "art" productions, touring companies also brought in plenty of shund, less aspiring material that more readily appealed to the masses.

Once the proud home of Yiddish theatre in Toronto, the main floor of the former Victory (Standard) Theatre at Spadina and Dundas has been converted into a bank. The balcony has been preserved, however, although the stage area has been used for other purposes.

Toronto students connect with peers in Argentina

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

They say charity starts at home, but it often ends farther away.

For 22 Jewish students from Toronto, 2007 began with a heartfelt, 19-day mission to Argentina to connect with and provide tzedakah to that country's Jewish community.

In a joint initiative by Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee and Canadian Young Judaea (CYJ), the two groups came together to shepherd their youth members down south to do some good.

From Dec. 24 to Jan. 11. the students and their group leaders volunteered with various Argentine aid organizations, including local tzedakah foundations, as well as with summer camps for needy Jewish youth and with the Baby Help Program, a social assistance program for young children and families in crisis.

The group also brought nearly $150,000 worth of medical supplies to distribute through the central pharmacy of the Buenos Aires based Fundacion Tzedakah.

They also toured extensively, visited the Jewish quarter of Buenos Aires, met with Holocaust survivors and participated in cultural and social exchange programs with university students from Buenos Aires Hillel and Hanoar Hatzioni, the Argentine Jewish youth movement.

It was a trip many years in the making.

"The Argentine community suffered during the last 15 years," said Danny Richmond, national program director for CYJ.

Canadian and Argentine students hosted a klezmer concert and dance with Holocaust survivors in Buenos Aires last month. [Photo courtesy CYJ]

After the 1992 suicide bombing of the Israeli embassy in Buenos Aires, which killed 29 people and wounded 242, the community then suffered through the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish community centre, which killed 85 people, as well as the 1999 desecration of a cemetery near Buenos Aires, in which more than 60 headstones were defaced.

Then came the country's economic collapse in 2001. Sarah Zelcer, Ve'ahavta's director of international programs and education, helped co-ordinate aid for the community from Toronto at the time, but knew she also needed to plan a trip to help out.

Six years later, with the help of CYJ, Ve'ahavta finally made it down.

And for those who participated, the experience was enlightening.

"[Argentina's history] gave a lot of lessons to our kids on the dangers of terrorism, hate [and] finance," Richmond said. "Here's a community where kids were just as wealthy as a lot of kids in our community and overnight they lost it all."

Richmond said it was a "beautiful" experience watching the Canadian contingent jump into works of tikkun olam while creating strong bonds with their Argentine counterparts.

"I spoke with a lot of our students as they stayed up all night by the campfire," Richmond said. "They were shocked by how much more mature the Argentine students were because they've experienced so much out of life."

Abby Plener, a Grade 12 student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, was part of the mission.

"The trip was a revelation," she said. "[Argentina] is a democracy and the Jews we talked to didn't seem particularly threatened, yet the relationship they have with their government [since the economic crisis]... it seemed so different. To see people who would appear somewhat [similar] to us, who had this very different experience of democracy was something new."

Justin Binder, 17, also has fond memories of his time in Argentina.

"[The trip] was awesome. I really enjoyed meeting [Argentines] my age," he said. "We saw how necessary [tikkun olam] is down there. It just stuck out how these volunteers, who probably aren't so well-off themselves, how they just work together to deal with all these issues."

Binder said he keeps in touch with the friends he made while on the trip through e-mail and hopes to go back one day.

Another student, Nathan Ladovsky, 17, wants Canadians to realize that the Jewish Argentine community is still in need.

"When the economy collapsed, you had North American Jewry running down there to help, but it turned into a trickle," he said. "One of the purposes of this trip was... to re-open the floodgates, [because] the situation hasn't really improved back to the standards [the Argentine Jewish community] was used to."

Zelcer believes the trip was a good start.

"We hope with all its successes, relationships nurtured, goodwill and momentum we've created, it will serve as the launching pad for Ve'ahavta's ongoing involvement with the Jewish communities of Argentina," Zelcer wrote to the CJN.

How governments champion democracy

Policies that profoundly affect the Canadian Jewish community were announced or confirmed last week by three different governments – in Ottawa, Toronto and Quebec City. They are all worthy of mention, for each announcement provided insight into the respective government's approach to its understanding and championing of democracy.

At the biennial conference of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) in Ottawa, Prime Minister Stephen Harper reaffirmed the federal government's strong support for the State of Israel. Especially noteworthy, however, was the fact that he framed that support, unequivocally, on the basis of principle and not on expedience.

"A battle between a democratic state and terrorist groups who seek to destroy both it and its people is not a matter of shades of grey, it is a matter of right and wrong. When faced with such threats, Israel will always have a steadfast friend in Canada's government."

It is to the government's credit that it sees Israel's conflict with its neighbours in its plain and true light and is guided by this light.

At Queen's Park, the government of Ontario announced that it had shifted the date of the 2007 general election from Oct. 4 to Oct. 10, 2007. The change in date ensures that the election will not fall on Shemini Atzeret. Joel Richler, the Ontario chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, pointed out the significance of the government's decision. "With this change, our community will be able to fully participate in one of the most basic elements of democratic society… We asked the government of Ontario to reflect upon the diversity of the Ontario electorate and to make use of the options provided by the Election Act [to change the date]. It is to their credit that they have done so."

In Quebec City, Premier Jean Charest appointed a commission of inquiry headed by Gerard Bouchard and Charles Taylor to give the government some guidance on the increasingly nettlesome and nasty public debate unfolding in Quebec concerning the extent to which Quebecers should "reasonably accommodate" the religious or other sensibilities of minorities in their midst. The patently anti-minority manifesto published recently by the town council of Hérouxville and the decision last week by the Quebec Human Rights Commission to fine the Jewish General Hospital in Montreal for expelling an ambulance driver in 2005 for violating the hospital's long-standing policy on kashrut suggest that the will in Quebec society to allow for some of the differences of the "other" may be waning.

The decision by the Quebec government to appoint the commission was clearly intended to buy it some time and some policy cover. That it acted this way rather than decisively affirming that there is no contradiction between affirming the rights of the majority and reasonably accommodating the needs of the minority was not to its credit.

A Manhattan judge upheld an earlier ruling that a Jewish mother must give up custody of her son, 8, because she had violated an agreement with her ex-husband to raise the child as an Orthodox Jew. A custody transfer could not immediately be enforced, however, because the mother had left Manhattan with the boy and their whereabouts were unknown.

Clark wrong about Hamas, Hezbollah war

Former prime minister Joe Clark has every right to disagree with Prime Minister Stephen Harper's strong support for Israel. While stating that Harper does not understand the complexity on the ground, Clark goes on to suggest that our government was wrong on two fronts, namely in its withdrawal of support for the Hamas-led Palestinian government and for its strongly pro-Israel position during Israel's war against Hezbollah in Lebanon. Does Clark not understand that Hamas is a terrorist organization committed to the destruction of Israel and refuses to honour all agreements made by Palestinian's previous governments? The boycott of Hamas is supported not only by Canada but by the United States and the European Union. With regard to the Lebanon war, does Clark overlook the fact that Hezbollah guerrillas invaded Israeli territory and kidnapped soldiers and then after Israel retaliated, bombarded civilian citizens in the north of Israel? It is astonishing that Clark would do anything but condemn Hamas and Hezbollah.

Need to return to Torah to 'fix Israel'

I agree wholeheartedly with Gerald Steinberg's column "How the Diaspora can help fix Israel" (CJN, Feb. 8), but I wonder if he really addresses how that can be done. As I examined the Torah portion Yitro and the parshah Mishpatim, I read that we as a people made a promise: "We will obey every word HaShem has spoken." Nu, so did we? We ended up in Diaspora because of our failure to obey His word. What did we promise to do in the 10th chapter of the book of Nehemiah in the Tanach after the wall of Jerusalem was rebuilt and many returned to ha'aretz? "We will live by God's Torah, given by Moses the servant of God and will perform and obey all the mitzvot, rulings and laws of the Lord our God." Again nu…? The morality and ethical principles of which Steinberg speaks cannot be attained through our own will, for man will continue to battle his evil inclinations. It can only be attained through the heart and soul's return to Torah, in the way that God intended. May we as a people do true heartfelt tshuvah and may we in the Diaspora pray that the Messiah will come soon and bring us all back home! Then Israel will have the true leadership she is longing for.

School funding

I appreciate Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty's changing the date of the provincial election to Oct. 10. But anything less would be deplorable. As a Canadian, I have come to expect government to value all the various minority religious and ethnic communities' right to participate unencumbered in the election process.

There is an unnecessary parallel in the obvious discrimination in school funding that drowns in personal debt the working families of Ontario's minority religious communities. The premier ought to reverse this historical wrong and include these families and their faith-based schools in the same funding process that is provided to the Roman Catholic community and often taken for granted by the public-school-supporting community.

Hillel advocates for Israel

In "New group at York gives voice to pro-Israel students" (CJN, Feb. 1), the Campus Coalition of Zionists' president, Jonathan Roth, is quoted as as saying: "We were anticipating a response from Hillel… to show that Israel is not an apartheid state, but there was nothing like that."

Hillel, through its Israel advocacy program, has committed itself to creating a broad range of diverse programs in order to advocate for Israel on campus. While our advocacy may be characterized as "soft," it is reflective of a desire to change the terms of debate from a subject that has been all too consumed with conflict and that has failed to show the positive aspects of Israel. At the anti-Israel rallies on campus, our committee members regularly hand out information sheets regarding the apartheid lie, as well as Israel's security predicaments. Most importantly, however, Hillel's Israel affairs committee strives to show that at its very core, Israel has peace in its heart.

Scholar and teacher remembered

I wish to express our sorrow at the passing of Kolya Shimrat, a Hebrew and Judaic scholar and teacher.

Kolya organized a contemporary Hebrew literature study group. She undertook the painstaking tasks of finding the most recent Israeli literature, ordering the books from Israel, publicizing the meetings, distributing the material, finding appropriate venues, and finally and most importantly, mediating the discussions. Kolya also conducted Tanach study classes for seniors at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living.

Kolya will be sorely missed by all who knew her. We sincerely hope that others will take up the gauntlet and continue her efforts.

A Bible commentary for the 21st century?

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

What type of Bible commentary is likely to appeal to Jews in the 21st century? We Jews have a grand tradition of traditional Bible commentaries, generally divisible into two major groupings: pshat and midrash.

A pshat (or "plain meaning") reading of the Bible considers grammar, syntax, context and sometimes nothing more. A midrashic reading sets the didactic nature of the text as the highest value, and is willing to offer non-contextual readings of the text (and sometimes also non-grammatical and non-syntactical readings) in order to make the text more educational. Each of these approaches has its advantages and disadvantages.

Consider, for example, the dramatic story of the near sacrifice of Isaac in Genesis, Chapter 22. Readers who encounter the text for the first time are in considerable tension: will Abraham really decide to kill his own son as God commanded? The scene of the young boy walking "together" with his father (emphasized twice, in verses 6 and 8, in the laconic text) ostensibly to his own death at his father's hand is particularly wrenching. Some relief comes to the readers when God stops Abraham at the dramatic last moment and tells him (verse 22): "Do not raise your hand against the boy."

We would all feel better if the story finished by saying that Abraham and Isaac descended "together" from Mount Moriah. But it does not. The final verse of the story (verse 22) says that "Abraham returned to his young men, and they went together to Beersheba; and Abraham stayed at Beersheba." Abraham is now "together" with his young men (i.e., servants), and not with his son. Where is Isaac?

Rabbi Abraham ibn Ezra, the 12th-century man of pshat, believes that the exclusion of Isaac is immaterial. Paraphrased, Rabbi ibn Ezra argues: "The chapter is about the test of Abraham, not of Isaac. Isaac naturally was under his father's control. When the text says that Abraham returned to Beersheba, of course that means that Isaac did, too."

Is such an answer sufficient? Isaac's life, not Abraham's, was the one that was in danger as the events of the chapter unfolded. It seems to be unfinished business for the text to refrain from telling us where Isaac was.

Midrashic literature does not leave questions like that unanswered. One midrash claims that after the events of Genesis 22, Isaac spent three years in Paradise; another claims that he went to study Torah in a yeshiva. (Both midrashim are quoted in the 14th-century commentary of Hizkuni.) Traditionalist midrashic commentators are attracted to explanations that take their value systems – where concepts like yeshiva study and Paradise play significant roles – and read them into the biblical text.

Modern readers find themselves in the uncomfortable position of having to choose between commentaries that "under-read" (i.e., that fail to comment on everything that requires explanation) and those that "over-read" (i.e., that read references to Paradise or to yeshivot into biblical texts that never mention such concepts explicitly).

Another problem that modern readers often find when they consult traditional commentaries is that almost all comments in that literature relate to biblical words or phrases, or occasionally whole verses. Our great exegetes like Rashi (in the 11th century) and Rabbi ibn Ezra almost never commented on an entire chapter or an entire book, rarely explaining how an idea or a character develops as a book progresses.

In recent years, a new "school" of Israeli Bible interpretation has developed. It is often called, informally, Tanach begovâh einayim or "Bible at eye level." Its practitioners are expert readers of Hebrew who have deep literary sensibilities. They try to strike a balance between "over-reading" and "under-reading," and their commentaries often relate to extended units of texts. They provide insightful close readings of biblical texts, readings that generally portray biblical characters – even the greatest of our ancestors – as complex individuals with weaknesses and strengths, sometimes more weaknesses than strengths. Even though the leaders of this interpretive school are devout, learned rabbis (from national religious circles in Israel), their work is considered anathema by members of the haredi or semi-haredi community, as it consciously and purposely makes biblical characters look like us, and not like virtually faultless role models whose moral and spiritual level exceeds ours.

Until recently most of the works of this school of interpretation, including the works of Rabbi Yoel bin Nun and Rabbi Yaacov Meidan, have been available only to Hebrew readers. But now an Israeli rabbi of American background, Shmuel (Steve) Klitsner has published a fascinating analysis of the Jacob stories from the book of Genesis in English: Wrestling Jacob: Deception, Identity and Freudian Slips in Genesis (Urim Publications, Jerusalem and New York, 2006). The book also includes a careful analysis of a number of other biblical stories that, Klitsner argues, can only be understood properly if their intertextual links with the Jacob stories are revealed. This book should provide the English reader with an excellent entree into the Tanach begovah einayim school of exegesis.

Klitsner's book is not for everyone. It is not a good introduction to the Bible for the beginner student who does not really remember the basic outline of the story of Jacob in the Bible. At the other end of the spectrum, it is inappropriate for the deeply pious traditionalist who is convinced (and wants to remain convinced) that father Jacob was a much holier, more spiritual and more moral person than we are. And finally, it is not the right Bible commentary for the Bible critic who insists that the Bible is understood only by tearing it apart and reducing to its alleged original documents. Klitsner (p. 23) describes the approach that he follows as "the stance of the talmudic generations… and the stance of the most sensitive secular readers of the Bible, who humbly accept the integrity of the text while freely and fully interpreting its complexity."

Klitsner's book is filled with insights into the psychology of biblical characters, based on close reading of the text. He does not limit himself to reading short passages but tries to integrate the Jacob stories (which stretch over 26 chapters of the book of Genesis and echo in many other biblical passages) into one extended essay. Klitsner sees Jacob as a man who was unloved by his father (Genesis 25:28) and who, when he was in his 40s, was still not taking personal autonomy for his actions, passively accepting his mother's advice not to be concerned about duping his father, Isaac, since she would take responsibility for the negative fallout (Genesis 27:10-12).

While I have studied the story of Jacob hundreds of times, now that I have read Klitsner's book I will never see it the same way. Klitsner's close readings of texts demonstrate that Jacob remained psychologically haunted for many years by the fact that he had duped his own father. Others have suggested this theory, but no one has proved it as extensively and as well as Klitsner does. Both Klitsner and I, when each of us studied (separately) with the Bible master of the 20th century, Nehama Leibowitz, learned from her that you can see Jacob's guilt feelings when he turns to his brother, Esau, years after stealing his blessing through his masquerade, and says: "Please take my present" (Genesis 33:11). The problem is that Jacob seems to slip up. He does not use any of the standard Hebrew words for "present"; rather he tells Esau to take his "blessing," the very item that Jacob had purloined (Genesis 27:30).

Klitsner builds on this, piling up text that proves that Jacob was psychologically haunted for many years by his own duplicity. In one example, when Jacob has a big showdown with his father-in-law, Laban, he asks him (Genesis 31:37) "Why have you rummaged through [mishshashta] all of my possessions?" (referring to Laban's search for household gods that had been, unbeknownst to Jacob, stolen by his wife, Rachel). Again Jacob seems to use the "wrong" Hebrew word for "rummaging through." The Hebrew root m-sh-sh is invariably used in the Bible to describe how a blind person or someone who is searching in the dark feels for items that they cannot see. But Laban was conducting his search in broad daylight! Klitsner sees here another example of how Jacob was haunted years later by his own trickery, in which he was "felt" by his blind father (as the text repeatedly tells us, using that same verb m-sh-sh, Genesis 27:12, 27:21, 27:22), thus duping Isaac into mistaking him for Esau. A series of Freudian slips like this in the Bible builds up an impressive case for Klitsner's thesis.

Perhaps the most compelling part of Klitsner's book is his comparison of three stories in which a biblical character encounters God or an angel at a crucial juncture in his life, and ends up being injured as a result: Jacob's wrestling with the angel just before he meets up with Esau face to face (Genesis 32:25-31); Moses' encounter with God in the lodging place on his way back to Egypt when God "sought to kill him" (Exodus 4:24-26); and Balaam's encounter with God's angel as he was on his way to attempt to curse the Israelites (Numbers 22:22-35). The first to note the parallel between these three texts was, as Klitsner notes, Rabbi Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam, 12th century), but Klitsner develops the comparison in novel ways. He points out that all these texts are about men at crucial junctures in their lives wrestling with themselves, and with their own indecision. Klitsner manages to pair astounding intertextual references with deep psychological insights.

Is this pshat or midrash? I would say that it is a little of both. Klitsner and others from the Tanach begovah einayim school base their work on careful lexical, syntactical and grammatical analysis – the traditional tools of the pshat commentator. But their work is didactic, edifying and inspiring in the best tradition of midrash. One of Klitsner's strongest messages is that biblical characters (and we modern Jews, too) cannot simply give up our own moral autonomy (as Jacob did when he duped his father) when we think that God's plan forces us to do something. Perhaps a Bible commentary like this is just what the Jewish people needs today.

Martin Lockshin is professor of Jewish studies at York University. He is currently on sabbatical in Jerusalem.

The Maiden's lesson

Hannah Rochel Verbermacher (1806-1892 [95]), known as the Maiden of Ludomir, was a chassidic holy woman. In a chain of distinguished, if unknown, charismatic women, the Maiden stands out. Known as the Hasida, individual women were active in developing early chassidism, but few biographies are recoverable. Paradoxically, Hannah Rochel's story has been told frequently, yet she remains an elusive subject.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

A prediction of birth, a strange female child learned and able to pray in Hebrew, a young love, a mother's death, a mystical graveside experience, a vow of asceticism, a woman wearing tallit and tfillin – all these elements suggest mystery and gender-bending in the tales told of Hannah Rochel.

It's known that she used her inheritance to build herself a beit midrash (study hall and prayer site). Men and women came to her gornshtibel for blessings, healing and instruction. She acted like a rebbe, had disciples and spread her teachings. Eventually forced to marry, she "lost" her holiness, divorced and migrated to Israel. There she again immersed herself in mystical knowledge, found a following and became the only female Kabbalist in history.

Elements of her story are vague, but historical clarity is not my purpose. I am intrigued by the lessons of history. What can we learn from the Maiden? Was she the tip of the iceberg – an example of early chassidic equality? Or is she the exception that proves the rule of male patriarchal control? Was she a success? In the growing chassidic world today, she has no followers. There are no Hasidas today. When Gershon Winkler authored a fictionalized account of her life titled They Called Her Rebbe, the book was banned from bookstores in chassidic communities. Yet, she, like other charismatic females, did exist.

There are debates. Scholars can't decide on the historical accuracy of some elements of her story while acknowledging the basic outline. Religious leaders can't agree on a woman as a religious expert. Is it possible for a woman to be a mystic? Perhaps a male tzaddik's soul was trapped in her body? Was she possessed? What was God's intent? What do we do with an ascetic, charismatic, knowledgeable woman?

Feminists can't decide on what role gender played in her story. Was she following a male model or a female one? Did she transform her religious world or reify it? She was both rebbe and firzogerin (prayer leader).

So who was she? She was a passionate visionary, a healer, a learned teacher whose own voice is lost. My point: history is not the straightforward telling of a story. How we interpret and transmit it depends on many subjective factors. So be careful what lessons you draw from history and what role models we call forth. And read Nathaniel Deutsch's The Maiden of Ludomir.

It's a discussion that began at about the time of the Exodus from Egypt, and it's always guaranteed to liven up a party; Is anti-Semitism on the rise?

Here are some definitions of anti-Semitism that I use to judge the matter. Hatred and contempt of Jews leading to persecution, legal disabilities and personal peril – that's anti-Semitism. Denial of the Holocaust and disdain for its lessons – that's anti-Semitism. When bad behaviour of individual Jews is said to be the general trait of an entire people – that's anti-Semitism. Criticism of Israel for existing, let alone protecting itself against attack, and suggestions of boycotts and censorship by churches and unions – that's anti-Semitism. (Criticism of Israel's discrimination against its Arab citizens and other internal failings is not anti-Semitic, or else we would have to class a lot of Israelis as anti-Semites.)

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Let's look at the following in Canada: property ownership, access to memberships in social organizations; economic and educational opportunities and access to universities, professions, business opportunities, and capital; and legal restrictions on immigration.

The good old days? They weren't so good. Jews were denied memberships to athletic and social clubs well into the 1950s. In English Canada, they had Goldwin Smith's virulent (is there a mild form?) anti-Semitism to deal with in print, as well as having large local newspapers consistently vilify Jews. At summer resorts in both English and French Canada, it was "No Jews Allowed."

Whether restrictions were written into housing deeds or simply part of a neighbourhood's unspoken rules, Jews couldn't buy into certain areas of major cities. Access to universities was clearly restricted, and quotas on hiring Jewish professors and admitting Jewish students only began to slowly disappear after World War II. Department stores refused to hire Jewish clerks.

While Quebec had Joseph Plamondon and, in the 1930s, Adrien Arcand and his filthy Nazi harangues, the rioting that began in Toronto's Christie Pits made it clear that in the 1930s, English Canada also had a dark place in its heart where anti-Jewish feelings could boil over into violence.

As to the professions, recall that interns at Montreal's Notre Dame Hospital went on strike in 1934 when the first Jewish intern was hired. Jewish hospitals were not only set up as medical institutions. They provided the only place that most Jewish doctors could get a position. (In the West, Jewish doctors had an easier time accessing medical school and hospital positions.) And despite the myth of Jewish economic power, Jews were completely shut out of major national banks and executive positions at many other large corporations.

Immigration was restrictive well before the "none is too many" years. Immigration director F.C. Blair's anti-Semitism, which kept Canada's doors shut to Jewish refugees from Hitler, had a long gestation period that began before World War I.

In Canada, we had, until well after World War II, a very unsympathetic institutional structure to deal with. Today, there is no question that institutional barriers have been swept away. By any of my standards, anti-Semitism is at an all-time low.

"But," you say, "look at the firebombing of a Montreal school, and the rocks through the window of Hillel House in Vancouver. Look at vandalism in cemeteries. More significantly, look at the attacks on Israel in Canadian newspapers. Look at Holocaust denial. Look at the rise of anti-Israel sympathies on campuses across Canada, the academic boycotts being tried, the union votes (successful or not) calling for boycotts and condemnation of Israel."

I don't want to minimize these developments. They cause not only emotional pain – as in the case of Holocaust denial – they also distort the complicated picture in the Middle East and cause confusion over what the correct course of action there should be.

Looking at anti-Semitism in Canada today requires a subtlety that the old days didn't need. Not everyone will ever love us. We have to accept that.

The rampant Jew hatred growing in Muslim countries is another matter. There, we should worry. In the Muslim world, anti-Jewish hatred, with all the characteristics of old-fashioned western anti-Semitism, has blossomed. And while we suffer at home whenever Jews are vilified, or when Jewish institutions are vandalized, or when hateful anti-Israel screeds and votes threaten, we can fight back and demand that our governments protect us at home, and that they speak the truth and never cease to support the safety of Israel.

Religious minority rights vs. equality

Most people in the Canadian Jewish community would subscribe to our constitutionally entrenched values of freedom of religion, including its concomitant notion of respect for religious minorities, and multiculturalism. At what price, however, do we seek to promote those values when they conflict with another constitutionally entrenched provision, namely, that of egalitarianism?

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

The issue of equality is a sensitive issue that challenges many tenets of major organized religions. For example, Catholicism has struggled with this issue in recent years with respect to the admission of women into the priesthood. And we, throughout the Jewish world, have similar issues regarding the role of women, particularly in traditional branches of our faith community. This article is not intended to focus on this deeply felt and sometimes contentious matter. Rather, it is concerned with how the issue of minority religious freedom has come into conflict with the notion of gender equality in the context of contemporary Canadian society.

Ironically, equality, freedom of religion and multiculturalism are all integral parts of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. On occasion, these rights are the subject of cases before our courts. For example, in the Multani case, the Supreme Court of Canada recognized the right of orthodox Sikh adherents to wear the kirpan, or ceremonial dagger, while attending public schools.

However, in recent years, our courts have had to deal with situations in which one constitutional right comes into conflict with another one. This issue of conflicting rights has surfaced not only in terms of cases before the courts but has also arisen in respect of various incidents occurring primarily in the province of Quebec. These situations focus on the conflict between the constitutionally protected rights afforded religious minorities and those seeking gender equality.

This clash of rights has centred around the notion of reasonable accommodation. In law, "reasonable accommodation" is actually quite complex. However, in the present context, this notion addresses the obligation of modern Canadian society to take measures that are necessary in order to accommodate the practices and/or the lifestyle of members of religious minorities.

What is noteworthy are the number of instances demonstrating the effect of reasonable accommodation upon gender equality in the Jewish community in Quebec.

For example, there is the recent controversy surrounding a YMCA facility being asked and agreeing to cover the windows of its exercise room so that students at a nearby Chassidic boys school would not observe women working out in the gym. Another example is an internal police newsletter suggesting to female officers that it is best that male police officers deal with chassidic individuals. There is also the practice that, on request, only male driving testers be used to evaluate the driving of chassidic men.

These examples highlight the effect of a policy of reasonable accommodation on societal notions of gender equality, even if the policy is not formally mandated by law. Clearly, reasonable accommodation as a means to protect the Jewish religious minority in Quebec has trumped gender equality in the hierarchy of protected rights.

Our national political leaders have recently expressed opinions on this apparent conflict between reasonable accommodation of religious minorities and gender equality. Prime Minister Stephen Harper suggested that while we must encourage diversity in Canada, we must also respect the secular value of gender equality.

Similarly, Opposition Leader Stéphane Dion acknowledged that, while we as a society must be open to the needs of religious minorities, religious minorities must in turn be cognizant that we live in a secular society.

Although the instances I've referred to relate to the Jewish community, there are other examples of similar conflicts of rights in respect of other religious minorities in Canada.

Other than feeling confused and perhaps ambivalent, where does this leave us when confronting this apparent conflict between religious minority rights and equality? Some of these matters will end up in court and, no doubt, we will receive guidance from forthcoming judicial decisions. But in the absence of judicial guidance, society will be left to deal with this dilemma on an issue-by-issue basis as they inevitably occur.

The Kirshner File

Lebanon's future hangs in the balance as rivals duel

Lebanon is teetering yet again on the cusp of anarchy, as its pro-Western premier fends off increasingly shrill demands by the opposition, spearheaded by Hezbollah, to step down or form a national unity government under Hezbollah's domination.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The latest political crisis in Lebanon erupted last November when six cabinet ministers allied with Hezbollah resigned and its secretary general, Hassan Nasrallah, urged his mainly Shiite Muslim supporters to occupy the centre of Beirut to force the resignation of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, a Sunni Muslim whom he has branded as a Western puppet. Refusing to capitulate, and blaming Hezbollah for dragging Lebanon into a disastrous war with Israel last summer, Siniora accused Nasrallah of trying to subvert the nation and constitution and turn Lebanon into "a battlefield for regional conflicts."

Responding to Nasrallah's harangue, hundreds of thousands of protesters took to the streets in peaceful sit-ins and demonstrations. Last month, however, the calm was abruptly broken when clashes took place in Beirut and the northern city of Tripoli, causing the deaths of seven civilians and raising fears that old sectarian wounds, reminiscent of Lebanon's 1975-1991 civil war, had been reopened.

Last week, on the eve of the second anniversary of the assassination of Rafiq Hariri – the former prime minister who was killed in a massive car bombing for which Syria has been blamed – Lebanon remained in limbo as the impasse between Hezbollah and the government deepened, with no end in sight. As Siniora suggested, the standoff is of major importance because Lebanon, once a tranquil country whose confessional system seemed a model of its kind, has again become a battleground for various forces in the Middle East. Iran and Syria support Hezbollah, while Saudi Arabia, Egypt and Jordan, all Sunni states, have rallied behind the legitimately elected Lebanese government, which assumed office in July 2005. Siniora is also backed by the United States, Canada and the European Union, which have funnelled reconstruction funds to Lebanon.

The current struggle pitting Nasrallah against Siniora may well determine Lebanon's future and affect Israel.

For Lebanon, the jockeying is a reflection of deep-seated problems, from Hezbollah's defiant refusal to disarm under United Nations Resolution 1559 to anguished debate over whether Lebanon should officially endorse the international tribunal that probed Hariri's murder.

On the heels of his untimely death on Feb. 14, 2005, a loose coalition of Lebanese Sunnis, Christians and Druze staged a series of demonstrations popularly known as the Cedar Revolution, a name coined by U.S. Undersecretary of State Paula Dobriansky.

The protesters called for the creation of an impartial international body to investigate Hariri's assassination and demanded the withdrawal of Syrian troops, which entered Lebanon in 1976. In addition, they asked for new elections, hoping that Hariri's hand-picked successor, Omar Karami, whom pro-Syrian President Emile Lahoud appointed with little consultation, would be swept away.

Surprisingly, the protesters managed to achieve their objectives.

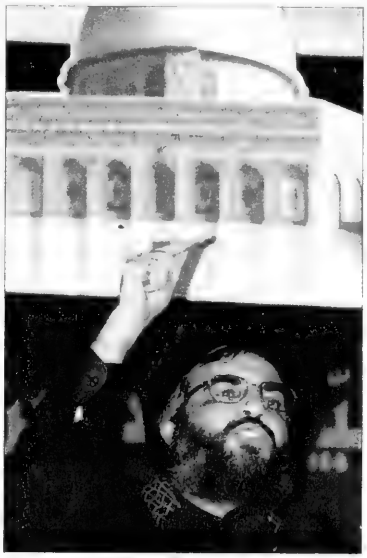
Bowing to pressure, Syria reluctantly withdrew its army and intelligence agents within about two months.

For the Syrians, this was a bitter pill, given their fervent belief that Lebanon is territorially part of greater Syria and was wrested away by France for the benefit of Maronite Christians. (Due to these historic grievances, Syria never established formal diplomatic relations with Lebanon).

Shortly after Syria's pullout, Lahoud asked Siniora, a former finance minister who had been close to Hariri – supposedly the wealthiest man in Lebanon – to form a new government. Seniora agreed, but had to walk a fine line.

On the one hand, he invited Hezbollah representatives to join his cabinet, boasting that he would defend Lebanon's honour against "Israeli aggression and threats." This was doubtless a sop to Hezbollah, which claims that Shebaa Farms – a small slice of land conquered by Israel from Syria during the Six Day War – is sovereign Lebanese territory. On the other hand, he promised to disarm Hezbollah through political means, a process he never even came close to accomplishing, judging by the stockpile of Syrian and Iranian rockets it amassed prior to its war with Israel.

At the request of the Lebanese government, the United Nations struck a commission to to investigate Hariri's murder. The first commissioner, Detlev Mehlis – a German public prosecutor from Berlin who had investigated the 1986 Libyan bombing of the La-Belle discotheque – presented two reports, the first on Oct. 20, 2005, and the second less than two months later. In both instances,



Hassan Nasrallah

Mehlis implicated Syrian and Lebanese military intelligence officials in the assassination and accused Syria of misleading investigators. Strangely enough, only days before Mehlis submitted his first report, Ghazi Kanaan, who was in charge of Syrian military intelligence on Lebanon from 1982 to 2003, committed suicide.

Since these developments, Mehlis has resigned, but his replacement, Serge Brammertz, a Belgian who was deputy prosecutor of the International Criminal Court in The Hague, is quietly carrying on his work.

There is reason to believe that Syria, in collusion with Lebanese allies, ordered Hariri's murder. When Lahoud was due to resign in November 2004, Syria feared that its interests in Lebanon would be compromised, and so asked Hariri to extend his term by three years. According to reports, Syrian President Bashar Assad threatened to "crush" anyone who opposed the extension. Under duress, Hariri acceded to Syria's high-handed request, but then resigned in protest, setting the stage for his assassination.

Damascus heatedly denies any involvement in Hariri's murder, but Syria, starting with the assassination of Druze leader Kamal Jumblatt in 1977, has had a long history of eliminating Lebanese citizens who have balked at its influence in Lebanon. Syrian agents are believed to have killed Bashir Gemayel – the duly elected president of Lebanon – in 1982, as well as his nephew, Pierre, who was gunned down last November, shortly before Hezbollah urged its supporters to hit the streets in an attempt to force Siniora's resignation. Apart from the Gemayels, Syria is said to have killed Samir Kassir and Gibran Tueni, both journalists, and George Hawi, a former Communist party leader. Syria also reportedly targeted Defence Minister Elias Murr, who claimed he was threatened by a senior Syrian intelligence official.

Although the Syrians no longer have troops on the ground in Lebanon, they exercise influence through Nasrallah, who recently admitted that Iran has aided Hezbollah by sending money and weapons via Syria. With Syrian help, Nasrallah is now attempting to oust Siniora in the hope of controlling the Lebanese government.

If he succeeds, Israel will have much to fear. Syria and Hezbollah – which a former Syrian vice-president recently described as "an instrument of Iranian strategy in Lebanon" – will be stronger. Further, the achievements of the Cedar Revolution may be jeopardized, and the durability of United Nations Security Council Resolution 1701, which ended the 2006 war in Lebanon, will be questionable. In short, if Nasrallah triumphs over Siniora, Lebanon may never be the same again.

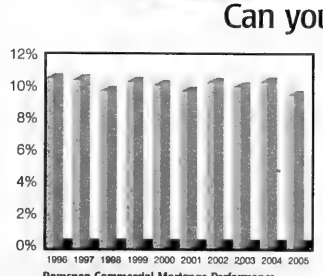
Can you say that about your RRSP?



Romspen Commercial Mortgage Performance
(July 1, 1995 – June 30, 2005)

If you're like most people, you'd be happy with an average annual return of 8% in your RRSP. Yet with low GIC returns combined with stock market volatility, few achieve this goal.

Now look at the chart. With almost boring regularity, Romspen investors have averaged an annual return of 10.2%. Isn't there room in your RRSP for this type of consistent and healthy return?

Contributions to the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund are RRSP and RRIF eligible. Likewise, this investment can also be held outside an RRSP or RRIF. Interest is paid monthly.

B'nai Tzedek grooms tomorrow's philanthropists today

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

Close to 50 teenagers are learning first-hand the ins and outs of Jewish philanthropy and the importance of tzedakah. The B'nai Tzedek Youth Philanthropy Program, an initiative of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, may only be two years old, but it has already raised over $250,000 in charitable dollars. Translated as "children of justice" in English, B'nai Tzedek provides bar and bat mitzvah age youth with the opportunity to endow a tzedakah fund and direct the proceeds as they see fit.

"As these children become Jewish adults, it is the perfect opportunity to empower them as decision makers in the community," says Angela D'Aversa, assistant director of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, UJA Federation's planned giving and endowment arm. "By educating teens about different agencies and programs both here and in Israel, B'nai Tzedek gives them a voice about funding projects that are meaningful to them."

Those projects have so far included hockey equipment for use at the Canada Centre in Metula, Israel, the site of Israel's only Olympic sized rink; providing the funds necessary to send underprivileged children to camp; tutoring for Ethiopian high school students in Israel; Meals on Wheels for Toronto's elderly; UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign 2007; and, many other worthy projects.

Youth philanthropists participate in B'nai Tzedek Action Day, December 4, 2006

In addition to the financial component, participants volunteer for different charities in the city. A strong sense of commitment is vital to the program, says D'Aversa, because making educated philanthropic decisions requires an understanding of what the different causes are all about.

"What's really important is that they're involved and committed to making a difference – not only financially, but in terms of volunteering their time. They have to make the difficult decision every year about where to allocate their dollars and learning about organizations in their community helps them take responsibility for their choice."

Jeffrey Handler, 15, the incoming co-chair of B'nai Tzedek, who will be keeping tzedakah in the family by taking the reigns from his brother Daniel, agrees. "They all seem like good causes, and they'll all probably use the money well so it's tough to decide where it should go," says Jeffrey.

Ultimately, though, the experience is an empowering one, he says. "This way we have a chance to choose where the money should go, and have a chance to be part of the Jewish community."

Brother Daniel, 17, who is headed off to university after co-chairing B'nai Tzedek for two years, agrees wholeheartedly.

"By sharing the generous gifts I received for my bar mitzvah, I know that I am doing my part," he says.

Funds are established with a minimum of $1,000. Some participants start their funds directly with their own money; others ask their bar or bat mitzvah guests to donate to their fund in lieu of a gift.

"I love being part of B'nai Tzedek because even though you are only one person, you have a chance to make a change in somebody's life just by caring and by doing," says co-chair Kady Goldlist.

Now in its fourth year, the Book of Life includes over 115 stories from individuals or families who have confirmed their commitment to the future of Toronto's Jewish community. These donors have been invited to participate in this recognition program because they have opened an endowment fund, left a legacy through a life insurance policy or created a bequest in their will. Their personal family stories have all been formally inscribed in the Book of Life, which eloquently serves as a community keepsake and perpetual reminder of where this community has been and our hopes for the future. Here is one of those stories, written by Eileen Chadnick on behalf of the Farband of Lithuanian Jews in Toronto.

Lithuanian Jewish Society establishes endowment

By EILEEN CHADNICK

Our society was established around 1910 by a group of landsmen who had come to Canada from Vilno, Lithuania and vicinity. It wasn't easy to start a new life in Canada. We came as furriers, tailors and other trades – and with not much more than the clothes on our backs.

We help our own. That's our way. It was then and it still is today. As such, our early mission was to support our brethren who came from the Vilno region. In those days we focused on anything that would make life a little easier for them as they started anew, such as providing interest-free loans, assistance finding work and a place to live. Sometimes it was simply offering a helping hand if someone got sick.

War-torn Europe after the Second World War prompted another substantial burst of immigration to Toronto. As more families settled here, our membership grew. We banded together because we had all experienced what it's like to be a newcomer and wanted to give back.

Then in 1948, a third, albeit smaller, wave of immigration came to Toronto from Vilno. As the years passed, fewer families immigrated from Vilno – but of course, they came from other places. Our society expanded its mandate to support our brethren more broadly – locally in the GTA, in Canada and abroad. After all, aren't we all part of the same people?

A key milestone for the society was the purchase of the Bathurst Lawn Memorial Cemetery. This ensured that every member in good standing upon his or her death would be entitled to a cemetery plot here in Toronto.

Israel was also a very strong focus for us. Over the years, we supported many projects including: Tel Hashomer Hospital, Therapeutic Riding Program – Kibbutz Grofit, in UJA Federation's partnership region of Eilat-Eilot, the development of the city of Eilat, Beit Dagan, Kfar Gvirol, the purchase of ambulances in Israel and much more.

While our membership has been somewhat modest in size (about 100 members or so) we were always mighty in heart. Our spirited volunteers worked tirelessly throughout the years. Notably, the Masada Chapter, our women's auxiliary, has been a very dynamic force within our group, contributing vastly to many causes locally and abroad.

Each year, the society donates funds to the UJA Federation annual campaign. It is important that we continue our support even long after we have each passed on, so we established an endowment fund that will give to the campaign in perpetuity. This honours one of our most important Jewish values: Take care of our own and others who are in need. We especially want to support the community that was there for us in our early days in Toronto.

L – R: Samuel Pupko, Lily Kutner, Barbara and Karl Nodel. Seated – Anna Nodel signing on behalf of the Farband of Lithuanian Jews in Toronto

The Farband of Lithuanian Jews in Toronto has a Perpetual Annual Campaign Endowment Fund (PACE) to ensure that its annual campaign gift continues to support the Jewish community long after the society is no longer around.

Capital Ideas

Don't overlook donating your RRSP

By JAMIE GOLOMBEK

By now, you're likely familiar with the new rules announced last spring by the Conservative government which eliminated the capital gains tax on donations of appreciated securities to registered charities. This change was embraced with open arms by donors and the Foundation has seen a significant increase in the number of donors now choosing to make their donations "in-kind."

Naturally, the new rules eliminating the capital gains tax on securities donations are of little relevance to those who wish to donate securities which are held in registered plans such as RRSPs or RRIFs, since the moment those funds are withdrawn, the fair market value of such withdrawals is immediately taken in to income at full marginal rates.

What has perhaps been overlooked, however, is a planning opportunity that has always been available should you wish to donate a portion of your RRSP or RRIF to charity. Note, this opportunity produces the best results if you're not in the top tax bracket, which kicks in at income over $120,000 for 2007, as will be explained below.

Jamie Golombek

Say you wish to donate $1,000 of stock from your RRSP to charity. You will face tax on the $1,000 withdrawn at your full marginal tax rate but you will also be entitled to a donation receipt equal to $1,000.

For someone in the top tax bracket, it's a simple in and out – the tax on the RRSP withdrawal will be offset by the donation tax credit.

For everyone else, however, because you get a donation credit at the highest rate for any donations you make over $200 per year, the credit can exceed the tax on the RRSP withdrawal, allowing you to use the remaining donation credit to offset tax on your other income.

Let's assume that Eli is retired and is living on income from his investments which totals about $25,000 a year, putting him in a 21% tax bracket in Ontario. Assuming he already made $200 of donations during the year and he makes a special donation of $1,000 from his RRSP, Eli would owe $210 of tax on the RRSP withdrawal but he would also receive a tax receipt for $1,000, which is worth just over 40% or $400 in tax savings.

In other words, by donating $1,000 of RRSPs to charity, he not only withdraws the funds "tax-free" but also gets an additional $190 ($400 - $210) of tax credits, which can then be used to reduce taxes on his investment income.

Sounds like a plan to me!

Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto surpasses $200 million

Endowment arm of UJA Federation growing by leaps and bounds

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

As little as five years ago, the thought of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto being worth one billion dollars was unheard of. Today, it's a distinct possibility according to its chair, Elizabeth Wolfe.

"The largest Jewish communities in the United States have created foundations in excess of one billion dollars. Five years ago that number seemed unimaginable for Toronto. Now it appears within the realm of possibility," says Wolfe.

Not a bad prognosis for the Foundation - UJA Federation's planned giving and endowment arm – which has seen its coffers grow from $21 million in 1994 to over $200 million today.

That outstanding growth allowed the distribution of over $6.5 million to more than 155 organizations last year.

"UJA Federation has already introduced the concept of a $100 million endowment fund for education, intended to support formal and informal education," says Wolfe. "The availability of this income is critical to ensure that future generations have access to high quality educational experiences, whether it is day school, camping or cultural programming. Working with Federation, the Foundation is continually seeking to assist donors to identify programs and initiatives that serve the Jewish community."

According to Wolfe, the Foundation's $200 million in endowment funds generate approximately $9,500,000 annually to benefit the community, while the capital in the endowments continues to grow. Some of these funds are directed into UJA Federation's annual campaign and some are designated to benefit specific organizations, often through scholarships or programs. Field of interest funds provide financial support in areas that may not otherwise receive annual campaign allocations. Donor advised funds are directed to a variety of initiatives that reflect the objectives of both the Foundation and the donors' interests.

"Community funds are available to support the strategic priorities and initiatives of the community that cannot be funded through the annual campaign," says Wolfe. "By growing the endowment funds, the Foundation hopes to provide a secure flow of income to the annual campaign, and to support a range of community services and programs that are beyond the community's basic needs."

Elizabeth Wolfe

So, with more philanthropic and investment choices available today than ever before, what is it about the Jewish Foundation that inspires so much confidence and such an eclectic roster of investors?

"The Foundation attracts donors who are familiar with, and believe in UJA Federation's ability to provide support and services to our community," says Wolfe. "The Foundation attracts donors of all kinds - those who make a simple and straightforward bequest in their will to provide for Toronto's Jewish community; those who wish to commemorate or memorialize a loved one; or those who want to ensure a continuing gift to a specific organization or program. It also attracts major philanthropists who use the Foundation to establish donor advised funds and provide ongoing assistance to their philanthropic endeavours."

The Foundation, like all Canadian charities, benefited greatly from the initial reduction in the capital gains tax on publicly listed securities, and has seen tremendous growth as a result of last May's budget which removed the remaining tax. Less than a month after Finance Minister James Flaherty announced the elimination of the tax, prominent Toronto businessman Lawrence Tanenbaum and his wife Judy donated one of the largest gifts in Canadian history - $50 million in stock donations - to the Foundation.

"The Tanenbaum donation last year exemplifies the opportunity now available to philanthropists to have great impact through tax-effective charitable donations," says Wolfe.

Thanks to today's technology, philanthropy in the 21st century is both easier and more challenging according to Wolfe. Still, the role of the Foundation remains constant: helping donors make well-informed choices.

"With the Internet, information is more readily available and needs and opportunities are now global, so today's donor is more sophisticated than ever," she says. "As the not-for-profit world becomes increasingly complex, the role of the Foundation becomes more essential, assisting donors to identify, evaluate and prioritize their philanthropic endeavours."

Tammy Anklewicz named new chair of Professional Advisory Committee

By MARGI OKSNER
UJA FEDERATION

Tammy Anklewicz

It's no great surprise to those who work in the estate planning field that we're currently experiencing the largest transfer of wealth that this country has ever seen, and, with wealth comes tremendous investment and philanthropic opportunities. Who better to suggest appropriate giving vehicles, structure a workable philanthropic strategy, and facilitate both of these than one's professional advisors.

That's where Toronto's Tammy Anklewicz - the new chair of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto's Professional Advisory Committee (PAC) – comes in.

"I've been involved as a volunteer with UJA Federation 'forever,' beginning with Young Leadership, Leadership Development, the Board of Directors and going on a couple of missions," says Anklewicz, a Partner at Fogler Rubinoff LLP, where she specializes in estate planning.

"Professionally, as an estate planning lawyer, I've had the opportunity to work with clients who wanted to make charitable gifts and clients who needed to be made aware of the benefits of charitable giving," she says.

"When I was approached by outgoing PAC chair Marty Rochwerg to consider taking on the role, I agreed because my professional focus makes me look more closely at pursuing long-term goals rather than an emphasis on just the here and now. I felt that my personal interests and professional pursuits are well-matched with Foundation's goals."

One of the things that impressed the new chair is PAC's role in educating professionals so they can better educate their clients and facilitate their giving. PAC also provides professional development and networking opportunities for those who are advisory committee members.

The goals Anklewicz has set for herself in this new role include the development of planned gifts among more financially modest clients; maintaining and improving PAC's excellent educational programs; bringing more young professionals into PAC; and finally, to making Jewish Foundation materials on planned giving readily available to both professionals and their clients.

"The first item on my agenda is to reach out to a wider base of donors," she says. "There are many members of our community who are capable of making planned gifts but who just haven't known how to, or haven't been approached," says Anklewicz. "Recently I was involved with a couple who made a donor advised gift to the Foundation that was very modest but very important to them and to the community. They were just starting to get involved in philanthropy and were interested in adding to the gift in future years. No doubt there are many similarly situated people who could be encouraged and stewarded if they knew how easy it is and that you don't have to be rich to give, just rich in spirit."

Through the generous sponsorship of the Mary Berman Fund for Yiddish Education at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, in partnership with several Yiddish education and programming fund-holders, the play No More Raisins, No More Almonds, *featuring songs written by youth during the Holocaust, is being presented at the Leah Posluns Theatre Tuesday, February 27th and Wednesday, February 28th, 2007. Purim on a shoestring: second-hand costume ideas

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

What are you dressing up as?

If childhood memories of last-minute bathrobe Mordechai (or Haman) costumes with tinfoil crowns still make you shudder, don't worry – there's still time to shop second-hand stores such as Goodwill and Value Village for a fun, cheap costume that will rock any shul's costume parade!

Because of Halloween, "October is one of our busiest months," says Kristin Germain, marketing and community development Co-ordinator for Goodwill Industries of Toronto. But at any time of year, she adds, "you'll find lots of unique pieces in our stores to create a funky costume… a crazy mishmash of things."

Germain says a complete Harry Potter costume, assembled by store staff, cost $12.50, including shirt, pants, tie, cape and glasses. A $12 firefighter costume was inspired by a "red jacket that had little metal clasps in the front," paired with overall rain pants and boots for a complete rescue hero look.

The tiniest children are easy to please.

Often, ready-made infant costumes are available at ridiculously low prices in the off-season. I bought my baby's duck costume at Value Village just before she was born – I figured with a one-month-old at Purim, I wouldn't have time to shop (I was right). The next year, she was a dinosaur dressed in a white sleeper (usually under $3) and white hat (99 cents) dyed green, with glue-gunned orange felt spots and felt "spikes" down her back for a spine and tail. Paleontologists might argue about accuracy and authenticity, but I still think she was the cutest baby dinosaur ever.

What about a mad-scientist get-up for a grown-up? White lab coats and scrubs are just a couple of the easy-to-spot "career" items. Here's an idea: earring, bandanna, eye patch, a swashbuckling scimitar, tall boots and a bunch of used CDs strung from belt loops. What is it? A software pirate!

Older kids are trickier. They've seen characters on TV or in video games and want to get it exactly right. In truth, it usually just takes a few details – ripped pirate vest, black ninja mask (either one can be crafted in seconds from a $1.99 T-shirt) – to convince them that they have the right look.

Other great finishing touches? Germain suggests a cowgirl hat for $1.99. Goodwill also has accessories such as purses, belts, suspenders and shoes ranging from $1 to $5.

Don't let them be snobs: kids absorb parents' attitudes and values about saving money – and creativity. "The stores are for everyone," says Germain. "There's all different types – many bargain hunters."

My biggest challenge was the year my son wanted to be his favourite character from Lord of the Rings. With luck, I found a men's natural leather overcoat (under $10). I cut up the leather and glue-gunned it over a cardboard cylinder to make a realistic quiver, then used the rest to make a vest and other authentic accessories.

Some "costumes" are ready right off the rack. Karate uniforms are often available. And there's no reason your little girl can't be Queen Esther if she wants to be, or a lovely bride in a white, pastel or regal jewel-tone satin dress that oozes lace and crinoline.

Sure, it's not your usual style, but for under $10, that dress will pay off not only on the big day, but for months to come when it's hauled out of the dress-up box. Don't have a dress-up box? Purim's a great time to start one. Haul out the costumes on snow days, or encourage kids to act out plays based on holiday stories or the weekly parshah (Torah portion).

Take the kids along if they're old enough. Who knows what will inspire them: it could be a men's Hawaiian shirt, a pair of psychedelic retro flare-leg pants, or the perfect pair of The Matrix sunglasses. One year, my daughter chose a pretty, plain white dress and went as a "flower-selling girl" – with second-hand silk flowers ($1.99).

For the festive meal, Value Village often has brand-new paper party goods such as cups and plates in sealed packages for under $2, with streamers and noisemakers not far away.

Who knew a Barney theme could add to the Purim fun? And for mishloach manot, a selection of like-new baskets are all under a dollar.

While Goodwill is a charity –"Revenues from the stores are how we support our mission of providing employment services" says Germain – Value Village is a for-profit business. Either way, with all the money you've saved, there's one more Purim mitzvah you can do: matanot la'evyonim (gifts of money to poor people).

Any rabbi will happily take your donation on Purim and make sure it immediately reaches the families who need it most of all.

Sisters donate hair to wig-making charity

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

The beautiful brown hair cascading down the backs of Hailey and Marlee Mandel took each sister 18 months to grow.

In minutes, inches and inches of the long locks vanished, and although the sudden change was somewhat unnerving, the girls say they felt great about it.

That's because they donated their hair to Angel Hair for Kids, a charitable program that provides wigs to children who have lost their hair as a result of medical circumstances.

"I think it's sad that kids lose their hair, so it makes me happy to give mine to them," said Marlee, 8, a student at Leo Baeck Day School in Thornhill.

The idea to donate their hair came from Marlee, who read a newspaper article about a similar cause.

"When she read about these young girls she said, 'Mummy, I should do that,'" explained the girls' mother, Sandi.

"I was so proud of her to be thinking in those terms."

Hailey, 10, also felt compelled to grow her hair, especially after doing a book report for school about a child suffering from alopecia, a disease that results in the loss of all body hair.

Hailey said she and Marlee have done a mitzvah by donating their locks.

"I know it's a good deed," said the Grade 5 student at United Synagogue Day School. "I really like my hair, but I'm happy to cut it off."

The girls have a personal connection to illness-related hair loss: their grandfather, Harold Mitgang, lost his battle with colon cancer at age 61.

"My father died from cancer and we felt that to give something back to this kind of cause instills good values in our daughters," Sandi said.

While the Mandel sisters provided a plentiful amount of hair, it takes hair donations from about eight people, in addition to financial contributions, to create a full wig.

"We are both excited and nervous to cut it off," says the letter, which was written before the girls' trip the hairdresser. "We know, however, that we will make some children very happy."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Equal, but not identical

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

Rabbinic Reflections

Is that fair? Everyone gives an equal contribution, rich or poor?

This week, we have the privilege of reading a special additional Torah reading beyond the regular weekly parshah: Parshat Shekalim, the description of the mitzvah of contributing a half shekel each year to communal coffers.

But the half shekel is only half the story.

In the time of the Temple in Jerusalem, there were various communal needs. Some were shared equally, some according to wealth. This has existed throughout Jewish history. There were some communal needs that required everyone pay their share equally, while other communal needs were borne on more of a sliding scale, with the wealthy paying more than the poor.

For example, if a community needs to hire a chazzan, what is the need and who benefits? We all need someone who knows the more complicated Rosh Hashanah prayers, so we all benefit equally from the chazzan. But Mr. Cohen wants to hire a fancy, trained chazzan with a velvety voice, while Mrs. Schwartz is happy with a sincere, modest and inexpensive young chazzan. Can Mr. Cohen force Mrs. Schwartz to fork out extra money so we can hire the fancier chazzan?

Jewish law dealt often with these types of issues – a communal need would arise, the need would require funds, but who pays and how much? Do we pay for the need according to means, or does everyone contribute equally, regardless of means? And is it fair for the wealthy to bear all the burdens of financing communal needs while everyone else benefits and freeloads?

The contribution of the half shekel was a head tax. A head tax states loudly and clearly that everyone is equal, that they contribute equally to the community and bear its responsibilities equally. These funds were used for the communal sacrifices.

This half-shekel mitzvah communicates the value that each individual is a part of the Jewish people. The daily sacrifice could not be contributed by one person – Mrs. Levine couldn't donate the daily sacrifice in honour of her daughter's graduation from medical school. The daily sacrifice is the offering of the people of Israel as a whole.

There were, of course, other communal needs. For these, the rich paid more, the poor less.

We always have to remember that there are practical aspects to contributing to Jewish life that require us to recognize and develop differences among people. Some are great motivators, others great and tenacious workers, others gifted at visioning, others blessed with wealth. We would be doing ourselves a disservice by not using these different talents. And, of course, when we recognize the talents of some, the rest of us feel a bit inadequate – we don't have that great visionary talent, so we feel second-rate.

But there are aspects of Jewish living in which we are all equal. We all can say the Shema. We can all visit the sick, volunteer with the elderly, give of our time, and do our own private mitzvahs. No one else has my abilities, nor my challenges, my energy, my laziness, my thoughts and my prayers. In this sense, we all contribute to the greatness of Jewish living, and we can't leave the responsibility of our personal mitzvah opportunities to the big givers, because they can't perform my mitzvahs.

We are all equal, and we are all different. We contribute according to our gifts, and we contribute in some senses in identical ways.

The half shekel is only half the story.

The power of the bar mitzvah

Ideas on Identity

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

I am in the throes of planning my youngest son's bar mitzvah. Our family has prepared in every possible way: maftir and haftarah learned, dvar Torah written, tzedakah project done, shul honours given out. Oh, and table linens chosen.

We even went to see Keeping Up with the Steins. My son winked at me when the mom in the movie blurts out, "Everyone knows the service doesn't matter – it's the party that counts!"

How hard it must be for my kids to have two parents who think the service is really what matters. How hard for them to face their friends and admit they aren't having a DJ or celebrities or professional dancing girls shaking all around. I can hear their friends clucking their tongues in sympathy and whispering under their breath, "Well, his mom's a rabbi, you know, it can't be helped."

For the past few years I've given a workshop titled "Raising the Bar: Beyond the Party," and I have, thankfully, met many parents who share my vision of bar mitzvah as more than a spend-fest.

They understand that the bar and bat mitzvah is a life cycle event for their whole family, a growing experience that marks a change in the family dynamic. They, too, are concerned about the excesses that they see, the money wasted and the food thrown out. They fret at the message that their kids get when they are invited to a classmate's party, but not to the service. They want this to be a spiritual milestone for their kid, not just a stressful time of memorizing and performing.

I'm heartened to know that while many parents show off at boorish affairs where bored kids get into trouble, many more are "taking back" the bar mitzvah experience and insisting that their families remember what the bar mitzvah is for.

It's for celebrating a child having the skills necessary to lead a service, read from the Torah, deliver a drash on an important Jewish concept, and navigate their way through the prayerbook and other central Jewish texts so they can join the adult Jewish community.

It's for families to acknowledge that their "little ones" aren't little anymore and should be given more adult responsibilities, both around the house and in the community. It's for sharing a simchah in an extended family's life just when the child is experiencing a difficult and turbulent time – adolescence. And it's for the community to say "we care about you" to a child ready to move into a new stage of their life.

Many Jews are unaware that the bar/bat mitzvah isn't commanded. It doesn't confer Judaism on the kid. It doesn't even appear in the Torah, and only has a mention in the Talmud as 12 (for girls) and 13 (for boys) being the ages for taking on mitzvot.

The "having a bar/bat mitzvah" ceremony is a relatively new phenomena in Jewish life, and really, any Jew who is older than 12 or 13 can take on the very same mitzvot as the child who "has" the ceremony.

So the parent who thinks that this one day is the be all and end all of their child's, and their family's, Jewish involvement ought to ask themselves: when my kid is 30, which name do I want them to remember, the name of the band or the parshah?

Jewish Life

The economics of health care

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Health care and economics can make for a volatile mix, and adding political rhetoric to that mix is a guarantee of fireworks.

The difficult balance between health costs and access to health care was highlighted by a recent decision of the Ontario Divisional Court. A retired high school teacher who spent close to $500,000 for a lifesaving liver transplant in England was denied any reimbursement for his medical expenses. At the time of the surgery, the procedure was considered experimental, with a very low chance of survival. While the patient is alive and well physically, his economic situation leaves much to be desired.

It's well known that pikuach nefesh, the saving of a life, overrides all precepts of the Torah – with the exception of the three cardinal sins of idolatry, adultery and murder. Furthermore, Jewish law states that one must give up all of one's assets to avoid violating a negative commandment of the Torah (positive commandants require spending up to 20 per cent of one's income).

Thus Judaism teaches that one must quit one's job if it would entail violating Shabbat, or even the less significant laws of kashrut. It would thus appear almost sacrilegious to worry about monetary considerations when one's life hangs in the balance. It seems quite cruel for a government to fight hard in order to be able to deny payment for life-saving surgery to one of its citizens.

But appearances can be deceiving.

The obligation to sacrifice everything and anything to save one's life applies only to the person whose life is in danger. For such individuals, money must not be a factor. Thus, assuming that no public money is available to fund a particular procedure that's necessary to prolong life, one would be obligated to deplete one's life savings, and then some.

Yet what is true for an individual is not necessarily true for other members of society, or for society as a whole.

Here we must take a broader view. While building a hospital on every street corner would surely save more lives, it would come at a great cost to a rich and diverse cultural life. While one can argue over what the priorities of government should be, political leaders have the right and responsibility to allocate funds in ways that meet the needs of the many in the various stages of life.

They may decide to invest money in an opera house rather than high-tech medical equipment. Spending hundreds of thousands of dollars for one person's surgery in Europe is wonderful, but at what cost to other initiatives? How many people could possibly be saved at home if that money were invested in another operating room.

In our particular case, if officials at Health Canada felt the treatment was unlikely to succeed (thankfully, they were wrong), there is even further reason to deny payment.

In his classic work on Jewish medical ethics, Nishmat Avraham (the soul of Abraham), Dr. Abraham S. Abraham rules that an individual, in order that he should not give in to despair, would be allowed to spend his own money in seeking all kinds of cures, even though they have no proven medical effectiveness. Others, however, have no obligations to financially help such an individual. If they choose to do so, the amount they spend would not count toward the amount that one is obligated to fulfil the mitzvah of tzedakah. Furthermore, Dr. Abraham writes, public institutions would be enjoined from spending money on such unproven cures.

Thus, if Health Canada has properly determined that a treatment is not medically sound, governments would have no legal or moral right to spend money reimbursing individuals who were able to "prove" Health Canada wrong.

Holocaust restitution

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

A decade ago, newspapers and the Internet were full of stories about survivors demanding the return of property that had been seized during the Holocaust. Under intense public pressure, many programs were established to return the assets to their rightful owners. But an upcoming study says that only one-fifth of the property seized by the Nazis has been returned. [http://tinyurl.com/yuo2e9] A report to appear in the Jerusalem-based Jewish Political Studies Review claims that up to $175 billion (US) remains unreturned. [http://tinyurl.com/25ug5m]

Although many important deadlines for applying for restitution have already passed, other programs are still accepting applications. You may need to engage a lawyer to assist in the claims process.

In September 2000, Gabriel Schoenfeld, senior editor of Commentary, took a look at the subject of reparations … [http://tinyurl.com/2eblxw] His article drew a great deal of response, including a letter from former U.S. deputy secretary of the Treasury, Stuart Eizenstat. [http://tinyurl.com/24kmbl]

Start your search for information about restitution programs at the site operated by the Conference of Jewish Material Claims Against Germany. You will find information and links about active programs involving the governments of Austria, Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Denmark, France, Germany, Israel, Italy, Macedonia and the Netherlands. [http://tinyurl.com/yonaf7]

I also recommend visiting the London-based Association of Jewish Refugees. [www.ajr.org.uk/claimsja.htm] That's where I learned that the Dutch government has announced a new deadline of April 4, 2007, for restitution applications for items of cultural value. [http://tinyurl.com/2clfxu]

Also approaching is a March 31 deadline for participation in a class-action settlement reached with the Generali Italian insurance company. "If your family was persecuted by Nazis or their allies during World War II… and you believe your family had an insurance policy with Generali, your rights may be affected by this class action." [http://tinyurl.com/2xxagk] Some heirs, however, have opposed the settlement. [http://tinyurl.com/25acpq]

The Czech government had established a Dec. 31, 2006, date for Jewish descendants to apply for the return of cultural artifacts. [http://tinyurl.com/ypuxpv] Rather than just extend the deadline, the government decided to do away with it completely in respect to … "20,000 heirlooms and artifacts," as the Prague Post reported. [http://tinyurl.com/2yrxoq]

In Austria, the government has created an online database (at the moment in German only) that allows survivors and heirs to search for family property that had been stolen during the Holocaust. [www.kunstrestitution.at] A related story from the Associated Press fills in the details. [http://tinyurl.com/2zy97b]

Compassionate listening builds bridges to peace

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Simply listening to people's stories of anger, frustration, hurt and hope can help build bridges between nations in conflict and create healthy relationships, said Barbara Landau, a participant on a trip to the Middle East organized by The Compassionate Listening Project.

In November, four Canadians – Cecil Fennell, Yasmin Khan, Eileen Gray and Landau – travelled to Israel and the West Bank as part of the non-profit, U.S.-based organization's trip to learn how to use listening skills as a peace-building tool.

On Jan. 29, about 50 people gathered at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education at the University of Toronto to see pictures of the trip and listen to stories told by Landau, Khan and Fennell about how compassionate listening techniques were used to shift polarized views.

According to The Compassionate Listening Project brochure, "the capacity to listen to 'the other' is a foundational skill to create and sustain healthy relationships, resolve conflict, and to help usher in a world where the loving essence of every human being can thrive."

Since 1997, Leah Green, the founder and executive director of the organization, has helped initiate contact between people on both sides of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Through the project, hundreds of North Americans have travelled to the Middle East to listen to the hopes and fears of both Israelis and Palestinians – whether they are settlers or refugees, soldiers or extremists, politicians or religious leaders – to help build relationships.

Landau, a civil mediator who is also the co-chair of the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims, gave an overview of their recent trip.

She said this was her second mission to the Middle East. She first went in 1999 after a life-changing event in 1990 set her off on a course to discover what could motivate someone to kill an innocent civilian.

"My daughter's very good friend, Marnie Kimelman, was killed by a Palestinian bomb on the beach in Tel Aviv. My daughter was in Israel at the time and was to spend the day with Marnie, but Marnie didn't join my daughter and opted to go with a group to the beach in Tel Aviv," Landau said.

"One of the key ways that we tried to understand it was to go on a Compassionate Listening trip to Israel and Palestine to listen deeply to the stories of both Israelis and Palestinians and try to understand their perspective."

She said she was compelled to participate in another trip because of the recent war between Israel and Hezbollah.

"I went back again this year because I was compelled to see what changes had happened as a result of the second intifadah and the Lebanese war."

Barbara Landau

Fennell, a psychotherapist, said that when she decided to go on the trip, she had no idea what she was in for.

"I was told by Barbara that this would be a transformational experience. I realize the power now of compassionate listening, and my personal relationships have gotten stronger and I see it as a great tool in resolving conflict," Fennell said.

During the forum, which was sponsored by the Community Social Planning Council of Toronto, Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims, Shrink the Gap and The Compassionate Listening Project, each member in the audience was asked to partner up with someone they didn't know, to discuss what concerned them about the Middle East.

Landau said that with compassionate listening, the idea is not to convince someone of a particular point of view.

"It's not that you are looking for a meeting of minds or that you are looking for common ground. The common ground is your humanity, that you are there to understand the person," Landau said.

She added that when listening to someone speak, the instinct may be to challenge them and "set them right," but people need to fight the temptation.

"This is really about how this feels and what starts to happen to you when you feel that you're really being listened to," she said.

A member of the audience agreed that it feels good to be able to express your feelings about any given situation and feel that you're being heard, but then asked how people can bring the issue to the political level where the real power lies.

Landau said that while part of the trip was dedicated to meeting with ordinary citizens living in refugee camps or victims of terror, the group also made it a priority to meet with the the Israeli prime minister's spokesperson, members of Knesset and other people in positions of power to elicit change.

"As people feel respected, listened to, deeply understood, they will start to feel more able to listen to other views and listen to others who may not agree, and they will start to feel secure enough to be able to start moving themselves forward."

Greater Toronto Area

Standard became a movie theatre around 1935

"They were usually tear-jerking melodramas," said Sol Littman, a former Toronto resident (born 1920) who now lives in Tucson, Ariz.

"Usually, the plots would involve a son returning home after being a bad boy, or a daughter threatening to marry a gentile boy, or a husband who marries a second wife in America and then discovers his first wife is alive and is coming to visit," he said.

"Locally, week by week, there were repertoire groups here in Toronto, and we used to bump into them on Spadina Avenue with their make-up on," he said. After the performances, actors and theatre patrons often hung out in Caplan's and other lively cafes and delis in and around Spadina.

In the early 1930s, as the children of Jewish immigrants reached adulthood with fluency in English, they turned toward the English stage, preferring, for example, Gilbert and Sullivan to a Yiddish Hamlet. The rise of the "talkies" was another factor behind the Yiddish theatre's irreversible decline.

"The live theatre ended largely because the audience ended," Littman said.

While Yiddish plays were still imported sporadically into Toronto for years to come, the Standard was converted into a movie theatre called the Strand around 1935. It was renamed the Victory in the early 1940s and was still used for various Jewish cultural events, benefits and political rallies into the 1950s. Later, as the Victory Burlesque, it descended into striptease.

Many older Toronto Jews still fondly recall attending cultural events at the Standard or going to movies during the Depression era and paying 10 cents for a fancy dinner plate.

"I not only remember going there, I remember appearing there on the stage," said Shirley Kumove, a Toronto Yiddish translator. "The Yiddish schools held concerts there. I sang in some concerts and delivered flowers to speakers."

Then a pupil of the Borochov school on College Street, Kumove even had lines to deliver in one production.

"I had to come out on stage and say, 'Daddy, Daddy, Mommy's run off!'" she recalled. "To this day, I don't know whom she ran off with, whether she ever came back, or even the name of the play. I don't have a clue. I wish I could find out."

Hospital fined $10,000 for booting kashrut violator

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The already complicated business of keeping a large public hospital kosher has gotten potentially more complex with a Quebec Human Rights Commission (QHRC) ruling that the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) should pay a non-Jewish man $10,000 in moral damages for expelling him from a hospital snack bar because he brought in non-kosher food.

The unanimous QHRC decision cites sections of the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms prohibiting discrimination on the basis of religion and protecting access to public places and services, as well as respecting the dignity and privacy of the individual.

The JGH has until Feb. 16 to comply or appeal. Hospital spokesperson Glenn Nashen said the board and its legal advisers are reviewing options and "their very serious implications," including the cost and time a legal battle would take.

During the inquest, the plaintiff, Urgences Santé ambulance technician Yvon Verreault, and hospital representatives gave conflicting testimonies about what exactly happened, notably whether Verreault was told there is a place elsewhere in the hospital where he could eat his own food.

The QHRC was not swayed by the JGH's contention that Verreault was not escorted out of the building solely because his food wasn't kosher, but also because only food purchased in the Atrium, the snack bar where the incident occurred two years ago, may be consumed there.

The QHRC heard that there is a sign in the Atrium stating: "Kosher area: Tables reserved for customers of our cafes. No food bought outside is permitted."

The dairy-only Atrium, like the hospital's four other food-service areas and its central kitchen, is supervised by Montreal's Vaad Ha'ir. The Atrium is operated by the JGH Auxiliary and profits benefit the hospital.

Verreault told the QHRC that around noon on Feb. 17, 2005, he and a fellow ambulance technician went into the Atrium, which is near the emergency entrance, after transporting a patient.

Verreault heated the lunch he brought with him in a microwave there and joined his colleague at a table. The Atrium's manager, Gregory Ginzburg, he alleges, told them "cavalierly" that they could not eat there because it was a kosher place and told them to leave the premises immediately.

When they didn't, a security guard was called in. Verreault testified that he asked if there was somewhere else they could eat their food and said he was told there was not.

The guard warned them that the police would be called if they did not leave. Verreault, who claims he remained polite, then left the hospital, escorted by the guard.

Verreault said that in his 25-year career he "never felt so humiliated," especially because the snack bar was full.

Verreault sought no specific damages, but wanted the QHRC to decide whether they had been "victims of segregation," something he said he found especially unacceptable in a government-funded institution.

The JGH's lawyer Benoit Dagenais argued that Verreault's complaint has "no legal foundation and rests on false assertions" because the Quebec Charter of Human Rights doesn't give members of the public the right to eat their own food anywhere they want in the hospital.

"Contrary to what Mr. Verreault alleges, the Atrium is not a public place or a rest area where people can install themselves as they please and where they can consume their own food." Dagenais said the Atrium's approximately 30 tables are for the "exclusive" use of its customers, just as they would be if it were a "commercial" restaurant.

While it has always been open to the general public, since its opening in 1934, the JGH has seen serving the Jewish community as its "mission," and that includes observing the dietary laws. Dagenais explained that non-kosher food cannot come in contact with the dishes or even the tables where kosher food is served.

(Only 28 per cent of the roughly 25,000 patients admitted annually to the 637-bed JGH are Jewish, but the JGH maintains that the great majority of Jews go to the JGH.)

Dagenais also stressed that the rules forbidding food being brought in, even food that is purportedly kosher, apply to everyone, including Jews.

"Mr. Verreault could not then claim that he was discriminated against in relation to a person who would have had a kosher lunch," he stated.

Dagenais said that food from outside, including non-kosher food, can be eaten in the employees' lounge in Pavilion A. Besides the JGH's 5,000 workers, the room is also open to patients and visitors. Ginzburg, who is an employee of the JGH Auxiliary, maintained that he was polite with Verreault and spoke to him in French. He said he showed him the signs that the Atrium is a kosher area and "indicated" that there was a room where they could eat "at the end of the corridor."

According Ginzburg, Verreault became angry after he said he was going to call security, and Ginzburg felt threatened. He described such an incident as "really exceptional."

The QHRC believed Verreault that he had not been informed of an alternate site to eat, ruling that the JGH had failed in the "obligation of accommodation" of religious equality that has been established by the Supreme Court of Canada.

The QHRC found that Verreault's expulsion was "tied to his refusal to participate or respect the rules of a religion to which he does not adhere," and it noted that the JGH is not only a public institution, but by its own definition, non-denominational. Forcing him to leave the building represented a "significant constraint" on his rights, especially considering that he was at the JGH in the course of his work.

Parti Québécois leader André Boisclair defended the ruling, saying that, while he supports Jews' right to have kosher food in hospital, non-Jews should have "the right to eat a ham sandwich in a Jewish hospital." (Verreault reportedly had spaghetti.)

Jeffrey Boro, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, said he hoped the hospital would appeal all the way to the Supreme Court, if necessary.

B'nai Brith Canada legal counsel Steve Slimovitch said he is certain his organization would intervene if there are further legal proceedings in the case. He believes the JGH has the right to enforce kashrut rules as long as it provides the "reasonable accommodation" of an alternate site for those who do not wish to obey them.

Harper helps launch Bible project

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Stephen Harper was the first to inscribe a verse of the Bible and receive an official certificate Jan. 31, at the official Canadian launch of the Bible and Roots Project, Peoples of the World Inscribe the Bible.

This project of the Israeli Embassy is the brainchild of Amos Rolnik of Israel, founder of Bible Valley, an international interfaith project whose goal, according to its website is "to have, in the foothills of the Jerusalem mountains, a region of comprehensive Bible experience."

Rolnik's research shows that the Bible has been translated into 2,500 languages and dialects. The idea of the project is to have people all around the world write a verse of the Bible in their own language. Once completed, the Bible will be housed in the Bible Valley, and the site will serve as a study centre promoting Bible culture, values and interfaith tolerance.

"I am privileged now to be here in the Parliament with you and to invite all of you to participate in this exciting project," Rolnik told the members of Parliament, representatives of various faith groups and cultures, dignitaries and economic partners who lined up to inscribe a biblical verse and receive a certificate.

The evening included other Israeli and the biblical themes.

Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker explained that Jewish National Fund was also a partner in organizing the evening, "and they have brought over the four chefs from Israel who prepared the menu for this event, all based on foods mentioned in the Bible."

The chefs had prepared the food earlier in the day at Le Cordon Bleu Ottawa Culinary Arts Institute, where the kitchen had been koshered prior to the event. Chefs Oved Alfia, Ariel Porat, Yaniv Hiumi and Netanel Bennaim prepared a wide variety of finger foods that incorporated spices, herbs and other ingredients mentioned in the Bible – truly giving those present a "taste of Israel."

While munching on the delectable samples of Israel's culinary art, guests viewed "From the Beginning," a photographic exhibit by Shai Ginott that depicts Israeli places and items also mentioned in the Bible.

Ottawa is the first Canadian stop for this exhibit, which will spend the next few months travelling across Canada, said Amit Gil-Bayaz, deputy head of mission at the Israeli Embassy and lead organizer of the Parliament Hill event.

Continuing the biblical theme, the unique fashions of four young Canadian designers were modelled for the guests. Coming from Toronto, Sharon Hann, Amanda Fortuna, Michele Morgan and Carolyn Mykytyshyn had each designed a garment illustrating a biblical theme or verse.

Morgan's "A Father's Gift," constructed as a patchwork mosaic, represented Joseph's coat. Mykytyshyn's "A Silhouette of Scrolls" actually consisted of separate scrolls assembled into a wearable garment. The clothing of Isaac's wife, Rebecca, who tried and tried to conceive a child and finally became the mother of Jacob and Esau, was illustrated in the creation of Amanda Fortuna. Sharon Hann portrayed Ruchamah, the allegorical unfaithful wife referred to in Hosea.

During the evening, Baker presented a certificate to MP James Lunney, who had arranged for the event to be held in the West Block. The certificate stated that trees will be planted in the Galilee "in honour of each and every member of the Parliamentary Friendship Group," of which Lunney is chair.

Que. commission to study 'reasonable accommodation'

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Calling it a question that goes to the very heart of Quebec's future as a nation, Premier Jean Charest last week announced the creation of a special commission to study the "reasonable accommodation" issue that has gripped the province for months.

Speaking at length for the first time on the matter when he made the announcement, Charest said he is worried about the direction and escalation of this public debate on how to respond to religious minorities whose practices clash with fundamental rights and values.

He hopes the commission will put the debate on a more "rational" track.

Charest said he believes there has been a misrepresentation of what reasonable accommodation is and that the media are highlighting incidents that are, in fact, the contrary.

He referred to four examples, three of them concerning the Jewish community, to illustrate his point, including the expulsion from the Jewish General Hospital of a visitor eating non-kosher food.

"Expelling an ambulance driver from a cafeteria in a Jewish hospital, that's not looking for compromise. That's the opposite of reasonable accommodation," he said.

He also mentioned a Montreal YMCA's frosting its windows at the request of a neighbouring chassidic congregation, a Montreal police guideline that female officers avoid dealing with chassidic men, and the case of a man who had to leave a swimming pool because Muslim women were there.

He said it's not surprising that polls show Quebecers are against reasonable accommodation, or that "certain elected persons are trying to fan the flames of intolerance."

Charest stated: "The equality between women and men, the primacy of French and the separation between the state and religion constitute [Quebec's] fundamental values. They cannot be made the object of any accommodation. They cannot be subordinated to any other principle."

He said that, while immigrants are welcome, they must adapt to Quebec values.

Formally called the Commission for Consultation on Accommodation Practices regarding Cultural Differences, the body is co-chaired by historian and sociologist Gérard Bouchard of the Université du Québec à Chicoutimi and author and political philosopher Charles Taylor, a retired McGill University professor who is an expert on pluralism and multiculturalism.

The commission will get underway in March and is expected to submit its report within a year. The Quebec Human Rights Commission will co-operate with the commission by providing information designed to help frame the discussion.

"Today, we are giving ourselves the means, as a society, to have a reflective and respectful dialogue," said Charest, who is expected to call an election this spring.

Charest stressed what he called the "moral contract" between new Quebecers and those who are already here.

"Quebec is a society of welcome. Newcomers, like those who preceded them, come to Quebec to share our success, to live freely and to make a new life. We need their contribution to Quebec. They come to enrich Quebec with their knowledge and their culture, they are constructing Quebec with us. But, each of them has the responsibility to integrate into our nation.

"That means that they must adhere to our fundamental values. It is, in a word, a moral contract between them and their new family."

In return, Quebec as a society must be open to differences. "Our diversity is today one of our greatest sources of wealth. That is an unwavering conviction for me."

The commission has a threefold mandate:

- to draw up an accurate portrayal of how exactly accommodations are being made;
- to conduct a wide-scale inquiry in all regions of the province to find out what Quebecers are really thinking "beyond polls and spontaneous reactions;"
- to come up with recommendations on how accommodations can be made that are "respectful of the common values of Quebecers."

The recommendations will be brought to the national assembly for debate. Charest insisted the commission's work be non-partisan.

"The subject in question goes far beyond partisan concerns. It is in the heart of Quebecers and at the heart of the future of our nation."

He said he chose respected academics like Bouchard and Taylor to head this "delicate work" because they are capable of "thinking universally, yet are profoundly rooted in the current reality of Quebec."

Charest acknowledged that until now, he has been guarded in what he has said about reasonable accommodation. Nevertheless, he said he has been following the issue attentively and with increasing "anxiety."

He has been especially perturbed because he thinks the debate rests on a "basic misunderstanding."

Rather than presenting instances of true reasonable accommodation, he said the media have been filled with stories that purport to be reasonable accommodation but are actually the opposite.

"It is now clear that the debate is getting bogged down and is leading to division rather than dialogue."

Charest affirmed that Quebec is a nation by virtue of its history, language, culture and institutions. Despite the current tensions, Charest insisted that Quebec has been a model for the successful integration of people from all over the world and of all religions and traditions. More than 45,000 immigrants are now settling in the province each year.

Quebec has done this, he noted, without losing its language and culture even though its population represents only three per cent of the continental total.

As unhappy as he is with the way the debate has been going, Charest said the issue is one that cannot be ignored. "This is a fundamental debate on cohabitation between different communities and the balance between the rights of the majority and the rights of minorities.

"The debate must go on. But in order that we make progress, it must be done on the basis of reason, and it must be fed by facts rather than perceptions."

Will return next week

Web hosting service removes site by hatemonger

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — After a request by a Canadian Jewish group, a major U.S.-based Internet hosting service has removed the website that got a Montreal man six months in prison for promoting racial hatred.

Earlier this month, B'nai Brith Canada publicly urged Yahoo GeoCities to drop the site immediately when it was discovered to be back on the Internet less than two weeks after its original creator and manager, Jean-Sebastien Presseault, was sentenced in Quebec Court on Jan. 23. Presseault had pleaded guilty to the hate charge.

"We congratulate Yahoo GeoCities for exercising good corporate citizenship by rapidly taking down the hate-filled website, once being made aware of its presence," said Allan Adel, national chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

"Yahoo GeoCities has clearly stepped up to assume its responsibility as a leader in the web-hosting community to stop the spread of online hate."

At the time the request to take down the site was made, B'nai Brith legal counsel Steven Slimovitch said he was not optimistic that Yahoo GeoCities would comply, because his experience has generally been that Internet service providers don't take responsibility for the content of the sites they host, especially in cross-border situations.

The site, which consisted of some 50 pages, was described by Judge Martin Vauclair as "vile, despicable and nauseating" in its depiction of Jews and blacks.

B'nai Brith went further, describing it as "genocidal" for its trivialization of the killing of minorities through "cartoons" and video games.

Despite the positive outcome in this instance, Slimovitch said the resurfacing of any website that has been found criminally hateful remains worrisome.

The site could have been posted by anyone, at any time, and points to the extreme difficulty of blocking Internet hate without international laws and regulatory bodies, he said.

According to Slimovitch, the Yahoo GeoCities site appeared to be identical to Presseault's former site, called "hatecore88wp," which had been hosted by another U.S.-based service, cjb.net. Presseault was order to close it after his arrest.

The site's reappearance was brought to the attention of B'nai Brith by a member of the public.

"It's not very difficult for someone to move a site, or parts of it, from one server to the next, in one country to another," Slimovitch said. "That's what makes application of these prohibition orders very, very complicated."

First of all, a Canadian court's judgment may carry little weight with an American Internet company, he said. "They are big believers in the First Amendment [to the U.S. Constitution, protecting free speech]. They'll say give us a court order and we'll abide by it."

That order would have to be from a U.S. court, or perhaps even from a court in the state where the company in based, he said.

But even after a court order is issued, the site could be altered or, more simply, posted again somewhere else in a short time, he said.

Nevertheless, Slimovitch believes Internet service providers have, at least, a moral responsibility to not provide a platform for the dissemination of material that a court has found to be criminally hateful.

He likened it to a newspaper's responsibility concerning advertising. No one, he said, expects a newspaper to investigate the veracity of every ad it publishes, but when it's pointed out that, say, a "massage parlor" is really a brothel, the paper is obligated to refuse the ad.

Ottawa man faces rights complaint for web hate

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Ottawa lawyer Richard Warman has launched a case before the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal against Bobby James Wilkinson, an alleged white supremacist who lives in the capital.

Warman and the Canadian Human Rights Commission are jointly asking for a $6,000 fine and an injunction forbidding Wilkinson and the Canadian Nazi Party from posting messages that will expose minorities to hatred and contempt under the Canadian Human Rights Act, the Ottawa Sun reported last month

Wilkinson is believed to be the first Ottawa resident to have a human rights complaint lodged against him for allegedly distributing hateful material online. He did not appear at a late-January hearing into the case. A decision is expected within six months, the Ottawa Citizen reported.

"Wilkinson was running a website forum/group called the 'Canadian Nazi Party' out of his grandfather's basement, where he was living in the fall of 2003 and early 2004. He basically threw open the doors, and, unsurprisingly, people started posting things consistent with the Nazi beliefs such as promoting the extermination of Jews, homosexuals, and others," Warman said. "Wilkinson didn't post any of the overt calls for genocide, but he did post other hate propaganda to the website. He was also actively trying to organize an actual real-world group under the same name."

According to Warman, "This was not a forum established to discuss puppies or bicycles."

He added that "the forum was run off of a U.S. forum-hosting company called EzBoard, who eventually closed it based on it violating the 'no hate speech' provision contained in their terms of service. EzBoard are clearly to be commended for their responsible corporate citizenship."

Warman, who is not Jewish, has identified and pursued a number of other people who have used the Internet to promote hate.

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, knows him well. "We have worked very closely with Richard. He is not Jewish, but has a moral centre and has taken actions which must be judged as hugely praiseworthy," said Farber.

He added that Warman puts himself at great personal risk because of his work and has received death threats.

"Those of us that have been in the forefront of dealing with cases like this have been threatened… this is something many people are not aware of," Farber said.

"When you have an organization behind you, it gives a bit of protection, but he [Warman] is doing this on his own. His courage is really something to be lauded."

'Must continue to oppose Iran'

"Justice, justice shall you pursue" Dion cited seven core principles of the Liberal party's policy on Israel and the Middle East, including a call "for a two-state solution and negotiations to that effect. Because peace calls for an independent, democratic and secure Palestine beside an independent, democratic and secure Israel."

The Opposition leader also said his party will "continue to support United Nations Resolution 242, which asserts the right of states to be free from threats or acts of force. When the current Iranian government threatens to 'wipe Israel off the map,' we can have no illusions about the seriousness of that threat and the need to confront it."

In introducing the Alan B. Gold Award of Distinction – which was accepted by Jacinthe Amireault on behalf of her late husband, Benoî Sauvageau, a Bloc Québécois MP who was killed in a car accident last summer – Bloc leader Gilles Duceppe said, "I am proud to be associated with the presentation of the inaugural [award] given posthumously to Benoît Sauvageau recognizing his dedicated friendship and commitment to Quebec's Jewish community and to the welfare of the State of Israel – a commitment that as leader of the Bloc Québécois I share."

Janet Solberg, daughter of the late David Lewis, a former federal NDP leader, represented her family in presenting the inaugural David Lewis Humanitarian Award. "His support of the Jewish state never wavered," she said of her father. The first recipient of the award, accepted by former NDP leader Ed Broadbent, was Broadbent's late wife Lucille, whom Solberg called "a woman of valour in her own right."

In brief remarks after Solberg, current NDP leader Jack Layton said, "This award, named after our former leader and a respected member of the Jewish community who brought so much to Canada, reminds us of the honoured place the Jewish community has within the progressive left in our country." He also repeated his party's position that "suicide bombing is a war crime."

Israel's minister of public security, Avi Dichter, a former head of the Shin Beit internal security services, praised Canada's support for Israel.

"Your position on the Hamas government after the [Palestinian Authority] elections shows your understanding that democracy means much more than just elections," he said.

Dichter also spoke of the grave threat posed by Iran, and said that most of the Arab world is terrified of Iran's nuclear capabilities. Israel will continue to seek peace in the region, he said, and he praised Canada's minister of public safety, Stockwell Day, with whom he held talks, "as a leader in the war against terror."

The dinner's keynote speaker, French historian, journalist and Middle East expert Alexandre Adler, provided an overview of current Mideast politics.

French historian, Alexandre Adler, keynote speaker

After describing the problems facing the Middle East, such as ongoing terrorism throughout the region, impoverished Muslims' resentment of the prosperous Jewish state, and the concern about the potential Iranian nuclear threat, Adler emphasized that there are also reasons not to despair.

He said he sensed a broad war-wariness in a number of regimes in the region, especially Saudi Arabia, whose monarch, Adler said, is more inclined to pursue reform than his predecessors.

He also pointed to what he saw as a subtle movement within certain Palestinian circles toward moderation and away from the religious fanaticism of Hamas.

Adler added that the people of Iran are not behind President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and he said he is hopeful that external and internal pressure on the Iranian regime will prevent a nuclear disaster.

"The battle is now," Adler urged.

"We have to isolate the Iranian government. Israel and the U.S. – and the other democracies of the world – must continue to oppose Iran," he added.

"We have to stay cool. There is a lot of threats but there is a lot of hope also… we shall still be there when Ahmadinejad will be forgotten – perhaps next spring, who knows?"

Israel has 'true friend' in Canada, says Avi Dichter

By BARRY FISHMAN
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — Canada's current government is proving itself to be a steadfast supporter of the Jewish state, Israel's minister of public security told the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) luncheon in Ottawa last week.

"I am pleased to say that after my brief encounters with your administration, Israel has a true friend and ally in Canada," Avi Dichter told the CIJA event. "Here I have found leaders who I believe share our values and know the meaning of courage."

In addition to his keynote address at the luncheon and later remarks at a CIJA dinner, Dichter's two-day visit to Canada included meetings with Prime Minister Stephen Harper, Minister of Public Safety Stockwell Day and RCMP Commissioner Beverley Busson. He also briefed MPs from the House of Commons committee on public safety and national security about Iran's nuclear ambitions and its support for terrorism, and about Israel's experience fighting Palestinian terrorism.

Calls spying charges against Egyptian-Canadian 'nonsense'

It was the first visit by an Israeli internal security minister to Canada, and the first visit to Canada by a senior Israeli minister in more than a year.

Speaking to reporters after a meeting with Day, Dichter denied allegations that a dual Egyptian-Canadian citizen arrested recently in Egypt had been operating in Canada as an Israeli agent.

Dichter said there was no basis for Egypt's recent decision to charge Mohamed Essam Ghoneim el-Attar with spying.

"I talked with people in Israel who probably may know about this issue. I would summarize it in one word – nonsense," he said.

"It's a fabrication," added Dichter, a former head of Israel's Shin Bet internal security and intelligence service.

Egypt has also charged three Israelis in absentia with spying. Cairo says the Mossad recruited el-Attar in 2001 in Turkey and that Israeli agents assisted him in obtaining a residency permit in Canada under a fake name and found him work in a Toronto bank.

Ottawa protested to Israel in 1997 after Mossad agents using false Canadian passports tried to kill a member of the Islamic militant Hamas movement in Jordan. Israel subsequently promised there would be no repeat of the incident.

"Those days are over… everybody understands the rules," Dichter said.

In his lunchtime address, Dichter had a sombre but at times upbeat message about the current situation in Israel.

"A sequence of events has presented Israel's leadership with a very hectic year," he said. "We have gone from crisis to crisis, both domestically and militarily, with very little rest in between."

Those crises have included former prime minister Ariel Sharon's illness, the election of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and his Kadima party, multiple ongoing political scandals, last summer's war with Hezbollah and the ensuing fallout in Lebanon, the election of Hamas in the Palestinian Authority, continuing threats from Palestinian terrorists, and the rise of Iran as a potential nuclear terrorist state.

Despite all these difficulties, Dichter vowed that when it comes to survival, Israel "will never retreat" and "we refuse to lose."

Nevertheless, he said he is concerned about Iran.

"For the past five years, Iran has attempted to build an 'axis of evil' that originates in Iran, runs through Iraq and Syria and ends up in Lebanon," he said.

At the same time, Iran is supporting Hamas in the Gaza strip.

Iran, and its support of regional Shiite groups, is considered a threat by the Palestinian Authority and the governments of Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States, he said.

"Iran is cynically using the hatred toward Israel which exists in these Arab states, and sometimes even among Arab leaders, in order to create a common ground with them," he said. "However, the Arab world and its rational leaders have identified the Iranian attempt to use them as a threat against themselves."

Dichter said he sees an "opportunity" that Israel must take.

"It will require extraordinary vision and a type of courage and knowledge," he insisted. "We need the courage to identify and confront our enemies which seek to deny us this vision of our freedom, of our right to exist – enemies hostile toward the very values which bind us as Jews and as a member state of the modern world."

Domestically, the ongoing inquiries into government corruption and military performance have forced Israelis and Jews abroad to reconsider the qualities they expect in their leaders, Dichter said.

"This is a question we must address with the utmost urgency and honesty for our survival as a Jewish state, for the sake of the Jewish people and for the sake of our children's lives."

As well, he added that despite all the military's faults and miscalculations in Lebanon, "we have created a level of deterrence that will force Hezbollah to think twice before attacking again."

He called on PA President Mahmoud Abbas to stabilize the Palestinian territories.

"If this is taken on and stability and security can be restored, then, and only then, will we have a serious chance of a political horizon led by the path of the road map [peace plan]," Dichter said.

After his visit to Ottawa, Dichter flew to Washington for talks with Michael Chertoff, the U.S. secretary for homeland security. They signed a joint memorandum on terms of cooperation in such areas as flight security, intelligence sharing, research in explosives detection, and terror prevention. He later met with U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who was due to visit the Middle East this week.

Winnipeg synagogue hires minyan co-ordinator

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Congregation Etz Chayim, Winnipeg's second largest synagogue, has hired a minyan co-ordinator to try to boost flagging attendance at its daily minyans.

And as it happens, Daniel Marcus, the new minyan co-ordinator, is also an experienced cantor.

"I began leading services right after my bar mitzvah," says Marcus, 32, who moved to Winnipeg in September from Brazil. "I had my bar mitzvah at a small shul. The rabbi asked me to lead services."

For 10 years, Marcus led services on Shabbat and the High Holy Days and at bar mitzvahs and weddings. After graduating from university with a degree in social communications, majoring in advertising, he went to work full time but continued to lead Yom Tov services.

Marcus grew up in Sao Paulo, Brazil's largest city, which has a Jewish population of about 60,000. His father was originally from Croatia while his Brazilian-born mother was the daughter of German-Jewish immigrants.

Growing up, he said, he was very involved in Zionist youth movements and served as a group leader for a number of years. His sister lives in Israel.

Marcus said he came to Winnipeg because he wanted to experience working in a different community. He chose the Manitoba capital because it happened that one of his teachers had lived here for a couple of years and recommended the community. She also told him about the Winnipeg Jewish community's efforts to recruit new members from South America.

"My teacher connected me to… Evelyn Hecht [the Winnipeg Jewish community staff person in charge of immigrant recruitment and integration at the time]," Marcus says. "I came here on an exploratory visit in February 2004, and really liked it here. Everyone was incredibly friendly."

Daniel Marcus

Before moving here, though, Marcus was offered a one-year contract working with the Brazilian sailing team, which was taking part in a round-the-world sailing competition. He had the opportunity to visit 10 different countries, where he procured supplies for the team members. He also liaised with sponsors.

He finally arrived here this fall. Within a couple of weeks, he found a position as a business development and account manager at a recruiting firm. (He made the contact at the Grow Winnipeg job fair at the city's Asper Jewish Community Campus in early October.)

"Because I enjoy chazzanut, I had contacted Tracy Kasner Greaves [Etz Chayim's resident cantor] when I came here in 2004. She invited me to call when I came back to stay," he said "After a couple of months here, I phoned and she told that the synagogue had a role for me. I met with Tracy, [spiritual leader] Rabbi [Henry] Balser and [executive director] Jonathon Buchwald and they offered me this challenge to boost daily minyan attendance."

Etz Chayim was formed in 2002 by a merger of three Conservative north Winnipeg synagogues: the Bnay Abraham, Beth Israel and Rosh Pina. The largest and oldest of the three was the Rosh Pina, which was founded in 1893 and has been at its current location since 1952. The Rosh Pina's membership had been in decline for a number of years. At the time of the merger, it had about 500 members, but the shul had been facing financial pressures for a number of years.

The thinking was that if the three synagogues merged, the result would be one strong egalitarian north Winnipeg synagogue that would have no trouble offering daily minyans.

But the thinking turned out to be wrong, at least as far as the minyans were concerned.

For one thing, some members at the Bnay Abraham and Beth Israel opted out of the new congregation (which is housed in the Rosh Pina building). And over time, several of the older men who formed the core of the daily minyan passed away.

"I spent the first three weeks attending the minyans, talking to the gabbayim and trying to understand the environment," he said. "Now I am calling people who have yahrzeits and trying to encourage them to come to say Kaddish.

"I am also trying to encourage more synagogue members to commit themselves to attending minyan on specific days. My goal is to be able to offer guaranteed consistent minyans. So far, I have been getting a very positive response. I have found that in Winnipeg, people are willing to help each other. You just have to ask."

Howard Kideckel, Etz Chayim's recently elected new president who is originally from Toronto, said the shul's executive is very pleased to have someone with Marcus' knowledge and exuberance working on the minyans.

"Daniel's doing a great job," Kideckel said. "Before he came, we were struggling with our daily minyans. Daniel is making a difference in persuading people to come for minyans."

Concordia student wins $15,000 entrepreneurship prize

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Concordia University student Danny Iny is $15,000 richer after winning the first-place prize for Quebec in a national student-led competition to encourage young people's entrepreneurship sponsored by the Business Development Bank of Canada (BDC).

Danny Iny

Iny's business plan for an educational software program designed to help children improve their reading skills, developed with partner Amale Khairallah, was chosen as the best idea among those presented by the five Quebec teams in the last round of the regional competition of BDC Enterprize 2007, hosted by Concordia last month. A total of 16 Quebec teams entered the competition.

The judges, who included professors and businesspeople, were looking for original ideas that are viable and lucrative, something they would theoretically put their own money into.

Iny, 23, will be in Vancouver from Feb. 15 to 18 for the finals of BDC Enterprize, Canada's largest business plan competition. He is vying for the top prize of $75,000, a $250,000 loan and consultation with BDC venture capital representatives.

Second and third prizes of $20,000 and $10,000, respectively, will also be awarded.

"It's very encouraging. I didn't expect to win," said Iny, an education and psychology major.

The competition was open to all students, not just those in business-related programs, currently completing an undergraduate or graduate degree at an accredited Canadian university. They had to enter in teams of from two to six.

Competitors submitted a plan and executive summary and then made oral presentations before the judges, people from academia and business.

Five regional competitions were held in January, with the top two finishers from each advancing to the national round. It's being hosted by the University of British Columbia's Sauder School of Business at the Fairmont Vancouver Hotel, where more than 500 students are gathering for the Enterprize student entrepreneurship conference. Enterprize was founded in 2000 by UBC's Commerce Undergraduate Society.

MaestroReading.com, which Iny has been working on since August and is still in development, features an illustrated storybook about the life of Leonardo da Vinci. Aimed at children in grades 1 through 6 having reading problems, and meant for use in school or at home, the story's language and pace can be adjusted for varying levels of ability.

Each page includes a colourful painting and soothing music. Narration can be turned on or off. Iny said the program may also help people learning English as a second language.

The site also includes tools to help kids practise recognizing and sounding out letters and words. One involves touch typing, which Iny believes will help kids who have problems visually distinguishing between letters that look alike, especially in lower case. There are also some free features, such as a questionnaire to evaluate a child's "reading readiness."

Iny hopes to launch MaestroReading.com in the spring, and said he got the idea for it after taking a course on learning disabilities with child psychologist Abe Worenklein.

Although there is a lot of remedial reading software on the market, Iny believes there's a need for programs such as his that allow kids to practise their reading fluency in an non-stressful way.

MaestroReading.com will cost considerably less than similar products. He'll be offering it for $60 a month to schools. In the meantime, he is inviting schools to test the program for free.

Iny has his own computer company, DanDesign, and works out of his downtown high-rise apartment near the Concordia campus. He is also a freelance writer, mainly of marketing and business copy, and published a how-to book last year titled Ordinary Miracle: Harness the Power of Writing and Get Your Point Across!

His team has a Middle Eastern flavour.

Iny, whose grandparents were from Iraq, was born in Montreal and moved with his family at age 13 to Israel, where he lived for eight years, serving three years in the army. He first worked in computer technology while in Israel.

Last year he was on the executive of Concordia Hillel, serving as director of Israel affairs, a job that included "bridge-building" with Arab and Muslim students.

Khairallah, a political science and French literature student at Concordia, is of Lebanese origin. She is currently interning at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

The programmer is Iny's cousin Oz Trachtman in Israel and the artist is former Montrealer Ruwayna Ghanem, now living in her native Egypt.

If nothing else, Iny hopes the young users of MaestroReading.com will be inspired by the life of Leonardo, the medieval artist who was also an architect, engineer, scientist and inventor well ahead of his time. "He had no technology, just a creative mind, to work with."

Question. Regarding custody: My daughter deals with her mother's emotional nonsense much too frequently for an eleven-year-old girl. I'm sure it's normal for a mother/ex-wife to badmouth and trash-talk her ex-husband. My daughter wants nothing more than to live with us. Is there an age when a child can decide on their own?

Answer. No, there is no such age. Nonetheless, by age 16, if a teenager moves with her feet, no court is going to stop her. No statute or court has ever drawn a line in the sand because with children, everything depends upon the individual facts and their best interests. And a child's best interests first depend upon who's telling the story and second upon who's listening. Even if one parent indicates where the child says she "wants" to live, a judge might well suspect the child is saying the exact same thing to the other parent.

Why would a child do that? First, the child may not wish to hurt the other parent's feelings. Second, a child may well want to manipulate the situation. It's not unusual for a child to "play" one parent off the other. What one child then "says" and another parent actually "hears" can cause tremendous pain to both.

For this wise reason, the child's age is not the only legal test because the true wishes of a child may not be the best criteria, especially when the child doesn't want to be asked or might be planning meticulously for a PlayStation 3. And if the 12-year-old child is immature, then the child's chameleon wish the next day may be a trip to Disneyworld, if properly coached.

Maybe child support is consistently late and mom can't pay the bills. Should her ill-advised bursts of frustration now really translate into a change of custody?

My strong advice: Take the pressure off the child. Sit down with your ex and start compromising for the child's sake. If you can't get past your mutual distrust, hatred and anger, get help from a mediator or therapist.

No rules about "when that kid turns 12 she's moving in with me and that will show her" are going to turn your daughter into a better person, a moral woman, a loving individual with a peaceful soul. When she's older you want her to say, "my daddy did the right thing." Remember also the words of William Blake: "We become what we behold." So set an example — lest your bitter child develops her own troubled relationships.

Lifestyle changes can slow Alzheimer's, experts say

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Even before Douglas Kearn was diagnosed with cognitive impairment about four years ago, he had first-hand knowledge about his condition.

Kearn's grandmother, mother and aunt had Alzheimer's disease, and when he began to notice his own memory problems, disorientation and lethargy, he knew what to expect.

Now in his middle 60s, the retired high school history teacher is on several medications to slow the progress of the disease, and is adamant about keeping his mind and body active.

He keeps his apartment "meticulously organized," and since learning that he has Jewish roots going back to the late 1800s in England, he has been researching his genealogy, reading about the religion, and observing the holidays.

He also knows the importance of reaching out to others with the disease, so he attends support group workshops run by the Alzheimer Society of Toronto and volunteers for the society, acting as a spokesperson at conferences and with the media.

"A big problem for a lot of seniors is that they are alone and don't have anyone looking out for them. They may not be aware that they are showing signs of [cognitive impairment."

With all the help that is available in the community, he says, he is surprised at the number of people who are still struggling alone at home.

"It's very easy to hide. In my current condition, I could sit at home and cry, [and sometimes I am tempted to do that] but I force myself to keep going. I know that is the key."

Dr. Paul Verhoeff, a psychiatrist with the memory clinic at Baycrest, says that increased age is a risk factor for the disease, but with the proper lifestyle changes, people can postpone its onset and reduce the rate of deterioration by about 50 per cent.

"Cardiovascular risk factors not only contribute to stroke and vascular dementia, they also contribute to cognitive impairment."

He advises patients to monitor their cholesterol, blood pressure and blood sugar, walk or take part in aerobic exercises, eat healthy, take vitamin supplements if necessary, avoid bad habits such as smoking and drinking excessive alcohol, and get plenty of sleep.

"These are simple things we can do to be proactive."

Important to keep your mind active

It's also important to keep your mind active and maintain a social life, he says. "Healthy activity enhances cognitive reserve."

In its 2007 campaign, Heads up for Healthier Brains, the Alzheimer Society of Ontario says that healthy living and a healthy brain are very much connected.

Dr. Jack Diamond, scientific director for the Alzheimer Society of Canada, said in a news release that "growing evidence points to many activities we can do to help minimize the risk [of Alzheimer's].

"For people already affected, studies suggest that social interaction and creative and mentally challenging activities may improve their quality of life and, in some cases, even slow the progression of the disease."

A survey of 1,800 Canadians conducted by the society revealed that about two-thirds of respondents are eating well, engaging in cardiovascular exercise several times a week, and maintaining an active social life, "but when asked why they participate in these activities, respondents did not make the connection to improving brain health."

Linda Stebbins, executive director of the Alzheimer Society of Ontario, said in the statement that "these findings are empowering. With our aging population and longer life expectancy, the number of people with Alzheimer's and related dementias will dramatically rise in the coming years.

"Awareness of brain health and its important role in healthy aging may prove to be our best defence in the fight against this devastating disease."

Obituary

Decorated veteran dies

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Sydney S. Shulemson of Montreal, the mostly highly decorated Canadian Jewish veteran of World War II, who devoted the postwar years to helping build an air force in the nascent Jewish state, died of a heart attack at his winter home in Florida Jan. 25 at age 91.

Shulemson was a squadron leader in the Royal Air Force (RAF) and quickly gained notice for his leadership and courage as a fighter pilot.

Born in Montreal in 1915, Shulemson joined the Canadian militia as a cadet at the age of 14. He was fascinated by aviation from an early age and had hoped to study aeronautical engineering, but the economic hardships of the Depression forced him to abandon his dream of going to university and work in the printing business.

In 1941, he enlisted in the Royal Canadian Air Force, qualified as a pilot, and then joined the RCAF's No. 404 Squadron, which in Britain, was put under the RAF's Coastal Command. He served for 18 months, completing 50 sorties attacking enemy shipping vessels and carrying out reconnaissance in the North Sea and the English Channel.

He quickly earned a reputation for his firing accuracy, as well as for gutsiness. Less than six months into his tour of duty, in 1943, he was awarded the Distinguished Service Order, the highest recognition after the Victoria Cross, for leadership and bravery.

The DSO is rarely given to someone with the junior rank of squadron leader, said Stéphane Guevremont, a Canadian military historian who is writing an authorized biography of Shulemson.

Shulemson was not a cowboy with a good aim, Guevremont stresses. He had devised a method of very accurately firing rockets from a moving aircraft, a type of warfare that was then in its infancy. Dropping bombs was still conventional combat.

Guevremont, a PhD candidate at the University of Calgary who is writing his thesis on the RCAF, said Shulemson was instrumental in the development of the rocket projectile, the forerunner of the modern-day missile.

The British so valued Shulemson's skill that they took him off dangerous missions to make use of his expertise in rocketry. He trained nine squadrons of RAF pilots in firing rockets and helped organized the world's first all-rocket-firing wing, known as the Banff Wing.

Six years ago, Shulemson was inducted into the Quebec Air and Space Hall of Fame for his wartime exploits.

After the war, he became attached to and later took command of No. 78 YMHA Squadron of the Royal Canadian Air Cadets. For a living, he returned to the printing business and also later had interests in mining exploration, but his heart was in helping the nascent State of Israel equip itself militarily.

Guevremont said Shulemson was instrumental in impressing upon the Israelis that they must develop their air power. "His advice was critical in the formation of the Israel Air Force," said Guevremont.

Between 1946 and 1949, he procured planes and other military surplus and recruited pilots for Israel's fledgling air force. This was activity which, of course, had to be done clandestinely during the pre-State period and even after. "His postwar activities are like a spy novel," Guevremont said.

Shulemson was recognized by Israel with a special citation honouring him as a "Fighter for the State of Israel."

Shulemson, who retained much of the dash of the ex-aviator with his jaunty mustache, died suddenly and was active and very sharp right up until his death, Guevremont said. Shulemson retired only at 85, and was golfing three times a week and still driving in Florida, he said.

In the Jewish community, he was active with Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith and the Masons, and had a particular interest in helping children attend summer camp.

Shulemson married for the first time at age 74. He is survived by his wife Ella and stepsons Rick and Jerry Lozoff.

For Miryom and Max, love took 50 years to bloom

By CHANA THAU
Special to The CJN

In 1950, when Miryom Kushner was 15 years old and growing up in Winnipeg's North End, she belonged to Young Judea. So did Menachem Roytenburg, then 16. She had a crush on him. He also noticed "Cookie" (so-called because that had been her first English word), but he never got around to asking her out because kids went in groups, not couples.

Fast forward a few years. Menachem, also known as Max, had become active in the Zionist movement and was travelling a great deal around North America. Then he went to Israel for a year of leadership training. When he returned, he found that his best friend, Leslie, was dating Cookie, so he could not.

Max went on to study agriculture at the University of Manitoba while continuing to work in the Zionist movement as a leader. He became program director at a Zionist camp in Ontario, where he fell in love with Lorraine, the arts and crafts director. They married at the end of camp that summer and returned to Winnipeg, where Max completed his first degree. As always, he asked about Cookie and found out that she, too, was married – to Leslie.

Miryom, always a giving and caring person, befriended Lorraine and made her feel welcome in Winnipeg. The birth of the Roytenburgs' first child brought the two women even closer. "When she had her first child… I felt like he was my baby, too," Miryom recalls. The Roytenburgs moved to Toronto and later to Montreal.

Years passed. Miryom had five children, and Max ultimately had four of his own.

Miryom divorced and remarried. She, her second husband and her children made aliyah to Israel. But they later returned to Canada and soon after divorced. Miryom married again to "a lovely man" with whom she lived happily for 11 years, until his death in 1994.

Meanwhile, life was not easy. She worked with older people, helping them out with meals, shopping and companionship, always with good cheer and grace. But the 1990s were especially unkind. Miryom lost her youngest son, Michael, to AIDS, and a few years later, her daughter, Kathy, to multiple sclerosis.

Max and Lorraine had also divorced after 21 years of marriage. He moved to Ottawa, where he met and married his second wife, Carole. They had one son and lived together happily for 28 years, until Carole's death from breast cancer in January 2005.

"I'm the kind of guy who sticks to a gal once we get together," he jokes.

Max had made periodic visits to Winnipeg where he had a sister and other relatives. He always made it a point to ask about Cookie.

But of his visit in October 2005, at age 71, he says, "I don't know what brought me to Winnipeg. It's almost as if I wasn't telling myself what was going on in my head."

He called Miryom and left a message on her answering machine. She arrived home from a trip to the Maritimes and found a multitude of messages on her machine. She decided to return only Max's call that evening, in order, she says, to "brush him off." Unaware that he was now a widower, she reluctantly let herself be persuaded to meet him for breakfast the next morning. Over breakfast, he told Miryom that he had lost his wife to breast cancer. After breakfast, he asked to see Miryom's paintings.

Romance didn't cross the mind of either of them until he entered her condo. But as soon as they walked in, Max, still in his overcoat, spun her around, took her in his arms and kissed her. Miryom says that when she kissed him back, an unspoken dream came true.

Max returned to Ottawa the next day, called Miryom four times a day and sent her a ticket to come visit the following week. In Ottawa, she met all four of Max's children. His two sons lived there and his two daughters had come from California and Israel, respectively, to help him move from his house to a condo.

Miryom smiles and blushes: "One of his daughters said to me, 'Has he asked you to marry him?' When I said no, she went on to say, 'He will, you know.'"

Sure enough, as he prepared to take Cookie to the airport, Max looked at her suitcase and said, "I don't like the name on your suitcase."

"Is that a proposal?" she countered. "Yes, I guess it is."

It was a whirlwind romance. For two months, the couple alternated between keeping house in their respective condos in Ottawa and in Winnipeg. In December, on the day they were to leave together on a trip to Israel, they stopped at the Ottawa courthouse to book a date to get married. The clerk said there was an opening at 4 p.m. that very day. "So I called my son," says Max. The ceremony was attended by Max's son, daughter-in-law and two grandsons "in white shirts and ties." After that, his closest friend drove them to the airport.

In Israel, Max's daughter in Jerusalem urged them to have a religious ceremony, so "we went shopping for a trousseau" and arrangements were made. On Jan. 2, 2006, the couple had a fairy-tale wedding on the Haas Promenade overlooking the Old City of Jerusalem, with about 50 guests in attendance. They included Max's sister, his children, his three Israeli grandchildren and an assortment of Israeli and ex-Winnipeg friends and family, some of whom Max had not seen in 30 or 40 years.

"The church bells were ringing," Miryom recalls. "And the muezzin was singing."

Max adds. "She wore a golden dress."

It was a warm and sun-filled afternoon. A flute-and-guitar duo enhanced the ceremony. Catering was provided by an Israeli friend with a Winnipeg connection. Friends from their long-ago youth movement were there. Max's grandchildren danced.

"You never think that at this age you're going to find somebody," says Miryom, with a huge smile.

The year since their marriage has been filled with happy times. They "enjoy spending loads of time together" and travelling around the globe, Max says.

They have made Ottawa their main headquarters for now, with Winnipeg a close second. They have visited Max's daughter in California, spent a month in Italy, where they stayed in a small town and made day trips to Rome, Florence and Venice, and then returned to Israel for the bar mitzvah of Max's grandson.

On the way home, they stopped over in Paris to meet Max's California grandchildren.

"It was marvelous!" Miryom enthuses.

"It's just been a blur," says Max.

In September, they were off to Seattle, where Max's daughter has an apartment, then to Mesa, Ariz., where Miryom has cousins. Last month, they went to Panama "to check it out," says Max, and they'll head to Ireland in the spring.

"We don't know for sure what we're going to do. We're living our wonderful story every day," Max says. "There are a lot of places that we haven't seen together. It's enough to enjoy each other's company but we want to see things and go places while we have the health and strength to enjoy them."

The secret of their success, says Max, is that "you've got to be open. The instant I embraced Cookie, I knew that was it. The rest was just detail."

He adds, "Life is a mystery. Our lives have changed on a dime. Perhaps this was our fate waiting to happen, the unseen hand from above. But it takes the courage to reach out and seize what you know is good, and risk disappointment or rejection. It is no discredit to our previous partners to admit that we have never been happier in our lives."

Mazon fundraiser helps to feed the hungry

Moving to Ontario Science Centre

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Mazon Canada, a Jewish Response to Hunger, is holding its ninth annual Evening of Kosher Delicacies, Feb. 21 at the Ontario Science Centre's Procter & Gamble Great Hall.

The evening features kosher chefs and wine merchants who will give guests an opportunity to sample their cuisine.

The new venue– for seven years, the event was held at Roy Thomson Hall, and last year it was held at the Capitol Event Theatre – can accommodate about 600 guests. Live entertainment will include Jordan Clapman and his trio, Sergio Schmilovich, salsa dancing by Tropicaliente, and illusionist Thomas Baxter.

Shira Lester-Cohen, Mazon's executive director, said the caterers, most of whom volunteer their services every year, see the event as an opportunity to give back to the community that helps them make a living.

Caterer Abe Levy of Taam Tov Fine Foods, who is joining the event for the ninth straight year, said the evening gives him the chance "to do something I love, which is feeding people. I wouldn't miss it for the world."

Lester-Cohen said she's indebted to the caterers and wine merchants who are helping to feed Canada's hungry.

"More and more people are hungry every year, and there are more hungry children who make up about half of food bank users."

It's difficult to help hungry children, she said, because "many hungry kids just won't admit it. They are embarrassed to tell anyone.

"[It's heartbreaking] to think that in a wealthy country like Canada, kids are going to school without breakfast."

Mazon raises its funds primarily from the Jewish community, and it allocates about $500,000 non-denominationally to more than 100 organizations that fight hunger across Canada.

About half the money raised comes from this event and a similar one that Mazon holds in Montreal, Lester-Cohen said.

Recipient organizations include Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors, in Montreal; the Ottawa Kosher Food Bank; the Grand Prairie Schools Snack Program, in Alberta; and McBride Seventh Day Adventist Church, in McBride, B.C.

Another Mazon fundraiser is the Gimel Project.

"This is a three per cent project, in which we ask families making simchahs to donate three per cent of the cost of their food of the event," Lester-Cohen said.

"If they spend $5,000, that would come out to $150. That is literally pennies when it is added on to the cost of the event. If they donate $365 they can feed one child breakfast for a whole year. There is nothing more fundamental than providing someone with a meal."

For the first time ever, four bottles of rare, commercially produced kosher wines will be on display at Mazon Canada's Evening of Kosher Delicacies and Wine Tasting on Feb. 21 at the Ontario Science Centre.

On loan to Mazel Wines from a private collector expressly for this event, the four bottles can be viewed, under tight security as stipulated by the collector, at the Mazel Wines booth.

To assist wine connoisseurs, Jewish history buffs and anyone interested in viewing them, Mazel Wines will prepare detailed information on each wine, as well as photographs that display their fascinating labels.

The four bottles provide an extraordinary glimpse into Jewish communal and business life from Europe in the late 1800s to Israel in the 1950s, Mazel says.

The wines, according to their labels, are:

• Tokaji Aszu, Vintage 1931, Grof Szechenyi Bertalan, Borpinceszete, Tokaji, Hegyalja, Hungary. Aszu wine, first produced in Hungary in the 1560s in the city of Tokaji, is known as, "The wine of kings and the king of wines."

• Alicante Superieur, Produce of Palestine, des Vignobles des Richon-le-Zion et Zichron Jacob, imported and bottled by J. Goldstein, Amsterdam. The many awards listed on the label date from 1897 to 1911. Research by Mazel Wines indicates that this wine could have been bottled and produced prior to World War I. The cork is sealed into the bottle with red wax.

• Grande-Cabes, Richon-le-Zion, Zichron Jacob, Palestine, Richon Carmel Hock (extra). The entire label is printed in Hebrew. Founded in 1882, the oldest and largest commercial winery in Israel was Grandes Caves Richon-Le-Zion & Zichron Jacob Ltd. At the first International Exhibition in Berlin in 1896, a special pavilion was devoted to "the industries of the Jewish colony in Palestine." At the 1900 Paris World's Fair, a wine from this winery won a gold medal.

• Champagne, Vintage 1950: a sparkling wine with the hechsher of two Torah giants, Rav Tzvi Pesach Frank, former chief rabbi of Jerusalem, and Rav Yitzhak HaLevi Herzog, former Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel.

Jerusalem mayor puts Mugrabi bridge on hold

By JONATHAN LIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd. ©

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem mayor Uri Lupolianski announced on Sunday that he had decided to postpone construction of the walkway at the Mugrabi Ascent until zoning authorities complete plans for the area.

Lupolianski and Western Wall Rabbi Shmuel Rabinovich drafted the decision yesterday following conversations with Attorney General Menachem Mazuz, municipal planning authorities, Muslim community leaders and other representatives of the Arab population of east Jerusalem, in order to allow the general public to review plans for the bridge and submit opposition.

Lupolianski announced that the measure reflects a desire for transparency and to foster a sense of co-operation with residents in the construction process.

In practice, the decision means that approval of the plan will be postponed until a hearing of all the letters of opposition filed by city residents. The salvage excavation being conducted by the Antiquities Authority is expected to continue at that stage, along with public discussion of the zoning plan.

Jerusalem municipal sources said yesterday that the decision could in fact be postponed for months, and that there is no certainty the zoning authorities that hear the arguments of those opposed will actually approve the plan in the end.

Lupolianski told associates yesterday that "the plan to construct the walkway engendered a wave of rumour and speculation about Israeli intentions regarding the [Al-Aqsa] Mosque. We therefore decided to be totally transparent with all residents about the walkway construction plan, so they will know clearly where it is to be built and to allow members of the public to express their positions to the zoning board.

"The move is slated to help people understand that the walkway is in no way injurious and does not enter the Temple Mount. It is important to us that there is no feeling that this was done covertly or sneakily."

The decision to draft a zoning plan for the walkway is controversial: City Hall has been satisfied until now with issuing permits – a rapid process – rather than demanding a broad plan, since the walkway is intended to replace an existing bridge and does not involve construction of a new structure. The city's legal counsel has said in recent months that a building permit is sufficient, but after the mayor's discussions with Mazuz and representatives of east Jerusalem, it was decided to create a zoning procedure and allow all residents to file reservations about the project.

PA deal meets lukewarm response globally

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Rarely in the annals of Middle East diplomacy has a major rapprochement been greeted with such puzzlement abroad.

While Palestinians danced in the streets of Gaza and the West Bank at the news of the unity agreement between the governing Hamas and rival Fatah movements, in Israel there was heavy skepticism over the prospects of renewed peace talks, and most mediator nations evinced cautious optimism at best.

Signed Feb. 8 in the Saudi holy city of Mecca, which is off-limits to non-Muslims, the Hamas-Fatah deal was opaque from the outset. When it was finally made public, it appeared to be little more than a document redistributing Palestinian Authority ministries among the new cabinet members and a call by PA President Mahmoud Abbas, the Fatah leader, urging Hamas to "respect" past diplomatic deals with Israel.

That fell short of the demand by the Quartet of foreign mediators – the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations – that the Palestinian Authority under Hamas embrace peacemaking, renounce terrorism and recognize Israel, if it is to receive western donor aid that was suspended after the Islamist group rose to power last year. But since Hamas looks robust despite the embargo, is fending off factional attacks by Fatah and increasingly aligning itself with Iran, western powers may be out of options.

So it was that the Quartet issued a statement "welcoming" the Saudi mediation in the PA deal but deferring a decision on how to respond until after U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice convenes Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to discuss the way forward.

Israeli officials, after first writing off the Mecca deal as a non-starter, quickly became more circumspect.

"Israel neither rejects nor accepts the agreements," Olmert said Sunday at his weekly cabinet meeting. "At this stage, we, like the international community, are learning what exactly was achieved and what was said."

Abbas had long promoted the idea of a coalition government as a means of softening the Palestinian Authority's profile internationally or making Hamas "moderate by association" with Fatah. But the Mecca accords seemed only to harden Hamas' line against the Jewish state.

Officials from the Islamic group, which the United States and European Union consider terrorist, lined up to reaffirm their opposition to ever recognizing Israel. Mushir Masri, a Hamas lawmaker, said the Mecca deal would force the West as well as the "Zionist enemy" to deal with the Palestinian Authority as it stands.

David Kimche, a retired Israeli spymaster and diplomat, predicted that Israel, outflanked by Arab and western states wanting to see an end to the Palestinian stalemate, may have no choice but to deal with Hamas.

"The ideal would be if we could find a magic wand that would make Hamas disappear, for Hamas stands for everything bad – fundamentalism, terrorism, to mention just a few," Kimche wrote in the Jerusalem Post. "Alas, such magic wands are hard to find.

"So we are left with two alternatives: refuse to deal with the unity government despite its willingness to open negotiations with us for peace and despite its acceptance by the Quartet, or to act pragmatically and do what is best for Israel, which is to end the stalemate that in effect only leads to a continued deterioration of the situation and, in its place, enter into negotiations with the unity government."

Cracks are already appearing in the Quartet's position. Russia, which broke with its partners last year by hosting a Hamas delegation in Moscow, was the only Quartet power to embrace the Mecca deal as a breakthrough.

"The future Palestinian national government will be an important factor in the process of reviving Israeli-Palestinian talks," the Russian Foreign Ministry said in a statement. "The implementation of Mecca agreements should be combined with lifting a blockade of the Palestinian territories, which has inflicted suffering and hardship on the people."

Authors & Poets

The CJN is pleased to announce its Annual Passover Literary Supplement

We invite our readers to submit unpublished, original works of fiction or poetry that explore Jewish themes. Stories should not exceed 2,000 words.

We must receive your submissions no later than Friday, March 2. E-mail submissions are preferred, but works can also be sent by mail or brought to our office. E-mail: info@cjnews.com. Mail: 1500 Don Mills Rd., Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. Submissions will not be returned. Only writers whose work is chosen for publication will be contacted.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN's 2007 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However, they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, Feb. 16, 2007. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of colour, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 23, 2007.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 1, 2007. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des loteries et courses du Québec.

Elie Weisel attacked at peace conference

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

SAN FRANCISCO — Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel said in an interview published Monday that an attack on him earlier this month shows that Holocaust deniers are increasing worldwide and getting bolder by the day.

The Holocaust scholar was dragged from an elevator and roughed up during a peace conference at a San Francisco hotel on Feb. 1, according to police. The author was not injured.

"Until today they used words. Now they have switched to violence," Wiesel told Milan-based daily Corriere della Sera. "Their numbers are growing by the day."

The assailant fled after Wiesel began to scream, and police have opened a criminal investigation. The 78-year-old Holocaust survivor said the incident shook him and that, for the first time since World War II, he felt he was being personally targeted.

"I feared for my life in a way that hadn't happened to me since 1945, before the end of the war," he told Corriere.

Wiesel said he hoped a posting on an anti-Semitic website in which a man claimed responsibility for the attack would help investigators make an arrest.

"It is crucial to discover if he was a madman who acted alone or the follower of a larger organization," he said.

In the web posting, a Holocaust denier said he accosted Wiesel with the aim of kidnapping him.

"Eric Hunt" posted an acknowledgment on "ZioPedia," an anti-Semitic website, saying he followed Wiesel onto an elevator at San Francisco's Argent hotel after Wiesel took part in a panel on peace at the conference.

"After ensuring no women would be traumatized by what I had to do (I had been trailing Wiesel for weeks), I stopped the elevator at the sixth floor," Hunt wrote.

"I pulled Wiesel out of the elevator. I said I wanted to interview him. He protested, grabbed at his chest as if he was having a heart attack. He then screamed HELP! HELP! at the top of his lungs."

Hunt said he let Wiesel go because "he was no use to our worldwide struggle for freedom if he had a heart attack." He said he "had planned on either getting Wiesel into my custody, with a cornered Wiesel finally forced to state the truth on videotape, getting arrested, or fleeing."

Wiesel, who survived the Nazi death camps at Auschwitz and Buchenwald, has worked for human rights in many parts of the world and was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1986. In the Corriere interview, he urged countries to take a harsher stance against those who argue that millions of Jews did not die at the hands of the Nazis.

"My incident shows a global trend. If society doesn't act immediately against these individuals, it will end up encouraging others to do the same," he said. With files from JTA

Olmert upbeat on Iran

Ehud Olmert said western diplomacy can still rein in Iran's nuclear program. "If the international community joins forces and applies the necessary restrictive measures on the economy of Iran, it will force Iran to reconsider its position," the Israeli prime minister said in an address to the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

Surgeon saves Iraqi girls

Two Iraqi girls received life-saving operations from an Israeli surgeon, according to the Israeli government's official blog. The girls came to Israel secretly via Jordan with the help of Israeli authorities and two local non-profits, according to a report on isRealli.org. One patient, Santa Maria Jamal Zaki, 6, a Kurdish Christian, was treated for a heart defect in Israel last year. In the course of that treatment a kidney problem was discovered, which was repaired in a second operation recently. A second patient, Hawara Said, 2, suffered from a heart defect that impeded the flow of blood to the lungs. She was operated on successfully earlier this month. The operations were made possible by Save a Child's Heart, an Israeli non-profit organization that brings children with heart problems from the developing world for free treatment in Israel.

One in 10 Israeli Jews intermarried

Around 10 per cent of married Israeli Jews have non-Jewish spouses, a study found. The New Family lobby, which promotes alternatives to Orthodox marriage rites in Israel, released data last week suggesting that 58 per cent of Israeli families include a Jewish mother and father. Approximately 12 per cent of Israeli families are entirely non-Jewish – many of them, presumably, Israeli Arabs – while 10 per cent of families have a Jewish parent and a non-Jewish parent. The remaining population is made up of single-parent families, common-law couples and foreign workers. The findings are believed to reflect the large number of non-Jews among recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

Canadian joins bus suit

A Canadian woman who was attacked last fall aboard a Jerusalem bus for refusing to move to the back to sit with other women is participating in a petition to the High Court to abolish the segregationist practice. Miriam Shear, of Toronto said she was assaulted by men who demanded that she sit with other women on a "mehadrin" bus. Such buses, on which men and women sit separately, run on a small number of routes in Jerusalem to serve the haredi community. Novelist Naomi Ragen has also joined in the fight against the buses.

Halimi buried in Jerusalem

Ilan Halimi, a young French Jew who was kidnapped and tortured to death in February 2006 by a criminal gang in a Paris suburb, was reinterred last Friday in Jerusalem. The ceremony at the Givat Shaul cemetery, organized by the Jewish Agency for Israel and at the private initiative of European Jewish Congress head Pierre Besnainou, was attended by hundreds of French Israelis, French Jewish officials and Jewish Agency leaders.

Strengthening community & building partnership in Canada, Israel and throughout the world.

The UN's elite apologists

By HILLEL C. NEUER
Special to The CJN

Commentary

As Prime Minister Harper has shown, supporting the United Nations does not require apologizing for its abuses. Even the New York Times, an ardent enthusiast of the UN, conceded that last year's reform of the organization's new Human Rights Council – which still includes Cuba, China and Saudi Arabia – was an "ugly sham." Kofi Annan himself exposed the bias of the 47-nation body – whose agenda is entirely dictated by the Islamic bloc and urged it to change course.

It is baffling, then, that Jeffrey Laurenti, a Senior Fellow at the Century Foundation and a former adviser to Ted Turner's UN Foundation, felt it necessary in a recent report not only to absolve the council but also to celebrate its creation – as one of the top 10 "Best in the World for 2006." Because Laurenti is one of America's elite commentators on UN affairs, his remarks are also alarming.

"The biggest institutional overhaul to emerge from outgoing secretary general Kofi Annan's UN reform drive," wrote Laurenti, "was the upgrading of the policy body overseeing human rights to a year-round council, four-fifths of whose members are bona fide democracies; the council's nation-specific focus on war-fighting excesses by Israel and Sudan, however, offended the West and Islamists respectively."

This little nugget deserves its own world ranking: despite heavy competition, never have so few words on a UN subject managed to convey so much misinformation.

First, the council is hardly an "upgrade." Yes, the new body meets more often than its predecessor, the discredited Commission on Human Rights. But even ardent UN enthusiasts agree that its record has been immeasurably worse.

The old commission met once a year, managing to censure states that were major abusers of human rights, such as Burma, Cuba, North Korea and Uzbekistan.

By contrast, the new council has failed to censure a single one of these countries. It has failed even to condemn Sudan for its atrocities in Darfur, despite finally addressing the matter in a December session. Abuses in the rest of the world have been ignored, including every country on Freedom House's list of the "Worst of the Worst."

Is reform impossible? No. Over time, a few modest improvements could emerge. But these will mean little while the governing dynamic – abuser regimes looking out for each other while the democracies waffle – remain the same. So far, it's been more regression than reform.

Second, Laurenti engages in malicious distortion when writing about the council's "nation-specific focus on war-fighting excesses by Israel and Sudan."

This is not only a gross misrepresentation of the council's record but also an odious, if not obscene, comparison of Sudan's atrocities of mass rape and killings with Israel's defence against violent attacks by Hamas and Hezbollah.

As of today, the council, wholly dominated by the Organization of the Islamic Conference and its extremist agenda, has devoted 100 per cent of its condemnations – three special sessions and eight resolutions – to one-sided attacks against Israel. Each granted impunity to Hamas and Hezbollah terrorism. But in a crafty formulation, Laurenti suggests these were legitimate criticisms of Israel's "war-fighting excesses."

As it happens, Annan, the world's major western democracies and even harsh critics of Israel such as Amnesty International have decried the council's politically motivated bias.

As for Sudan, Laurenti is apparently so eager to make his Israel-equals-Sudan analogy that he stoops to gingerly describing Khartoum's genocide as mere "excesses" in the context of war, not ethnic killing or genocide.

Third, Laurenti asserts that four-fifths of the council's members are "bona fide democracies." Yet according to Freedom House's annual survey, close to half of the members fail to meet the basic standards of a free democracy. So where does Laurenti get his figures?

He is obviously referring to the fact that 37 council members have signed on to the "Community of Democracies," a loose association whose membership requires painfully little, with more than 100 countries waved in. Under Laurenti's definition, however, it is a badge of honor for the Human Rights Council to include such countries as Algeria, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Jordan, Morocco, and Vladimir Putin's Russia-regimes that jail journalists, trample basic freedoms or commit systematic torture. These are just some of Laurenti's "bona fide democracies."

Reckless words have consequences. Invoking a state's solemn pledges to the Community of Democracies is rightly used by activists as a sword, to hold governments accountable. But in a dramatic reversal – one that will startle democracy supporters everywhere – Laurenti now advocates using that membership as a shield, to protect subverted UN bodies and, effectively, their repressive members.

In his defence, Laurenti is guilty only of a copycat crime. The first to purvey this misleading apologia was Morton Halperin, a senior official at George Soros' Open Society group, in his report issued after the first election of council members in May 2006, and repeated months later in testimony before Congress. Then, in July, the UN Foundation, on its blog that rebuts critiques of the world body, beamed about the council's "37 democracies."

Finally, a senior official of Human Rights Watch celebrated the same misleading figure at a September seminar in New York. Being on the panel, I noted that by the same logic one ought to celebrate the bona fides of all council members, each a signatory to the Universal Declaration on Human Rights. There was no rebuttal. Yet not two months later, that individual wrote an op-ed saying that "37 of the council's 47 members are considered democracies."

Does all of this matter? It does. Ordinary citizens are judging the UN by the credibility of its most touted reforms. For various motives – including an ideology that believes the U.S. to be a global menace that must be checked by a powerful UN – leading activists are fudging facts to mask the ugly sores of illegitimacy on the organization's flagship human rights body.

However unwittingly, the contorted arguments of Laurenti and his fellow travelers play to the worst forces of extremism that now threaten international peace and security, and contrary to the courageous pleas of Annan, only encourage the council's further deterioration.

Determined to keep pressure on politicians

Miki Goldwasser, Ehud's mother, said, "We don't have any signs of life. We don't have anything. They [Hezbollah] are not acting according to any conventions at all. They don't act with humanitarian acts."

Unlike Benny Regev, who credits the Israeli government for leaving no stone unturned in trying to retrieve his brother, Miki Goldwasser believes "the Israeli government could do more." She believes the government is distracted by other concerns and it has "not used all [its] creative thinking" or all its resources.

"Look, as a mother, I want my son back," she said.

The soldiers' parents are determined to keep pressure on politicians, she continued. "They get every day thousands of e-mails, petitions from all over the world."

A spokesperson for the Israeli embassy in Ottawa said the Jewish state "will exert every effort to bring home the abducted soldiers. Prime Minister [Ehud] Olmert and Foreign Minister [Tzipi] Livni raise this issue at the highest levels abroad and are working tirelessly in this regard.

"In addition, the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs assists the families of the abducted soldiers in their meetings, both abroad and with foreign leaders visiting Israel, in an effort to keep this cause on the international public agenda," said Ofir Gendelman, second secretary and spokesperson for the embassy.

Asked how her family is coping with Ehud's kidnapping, Miki said, "We are pressing more, fighting for it, and we won't let it slip between the fingers. We won't let it be like Ron Arad," referring to an Israeli airman shot down over Lebanon in 1986. It is believed he was captured by terrorists and little has been heard about him in the intervening years.

"The Arad family was silent for two years. They believed the government and didn't do anything. As we heard, negotiations failed because of not agreeing to the requests of the other, and in my case, we won't let that happen," Miki said.

Israeli and Lebanese families share a desire to see their sons repatriated, she said. Israel captured Hezbollah fighters during the conflict, and she believes because Hezbollah wants to gain political influence in the Lebanese government, it is susceptible to public pressure.

"We want them to open their minds. [Hezbollah leader Hassan] Nasrallah is a clever man. We know he didn't kidnap my son just to annoy me. He promised his people to free Lebanese prisoners, and he is a man of honour who keeps his promise," she said.

"I don't understand why he didn't go to negotiations and finish it," she added.

Benny Regev faulted the Lebanese government for its inaction. "Lebanon is acting as if it's a problem for somebody else. They make no effort to stop Hezbollah or to make sure the [UN] resolution will become a reality. It's like dancing at two weddings. They want to be part of the international community, but they don't do anything to be like that – to accept international law, the world resolution.

"Israel is willing to trade, to pay the price, a high price, to release their soldiers, maybe even [hand over] terrorists. But there is no effort from their side to make a trade."

For the Regev family, "it's very difficult. It's like walking in the dark. But we still hope. Hezbollah wants to keep them alive, they'll get a higher price if they keep them alive.

"I ask all humankind to do something about the situation."

Miki Goldwasser said she expected more from the Israeli government. Prior to the kidnapping, Hezbollah warned that they planned to abduct Israeli soldiers, so the government bears responsibility for not adequately protecting them, she said.

She called on Canadians to "please help us, help the Israeli families and the Lebanese families. Both sides want their sons back home, and there is no way organizations like Hezbollah should control our lives."

"There is no reason not to have peace with Lebanon… There is no reason to be at war. Lebanese people should listen to the voices of peace and make peace between us first of all by reclaiming our sons."

UJC set to help Gaza evacuees

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — In November 2005, a few months after some 10,000 Israelis were removed from their homes in Gaza and the West Bank as part of Israel's unilateral withdrawal from those areas, Lee Wunsch went to see the evacuees' living conditions first hand.

Nearly 80 per cent of the families were living in hotels rather than homes.

"Not one of them were hotels any of our federation missions would stay at," said Wunsch, CEO of the Jewish Federation of Greater Houston. "And they were filled with families and kids. Instead of two or three people in a room, there were parents with three, four or five kids."

Eighteen months after the evacuation, the situation isn't much better.

"Unfortunately, while most American Jews supported the disengagement, they're not aware beyond the political issues of the gravity of the needs that existed for evacuees right after the disengagement and now," Wunsch told JTA. "It captured the imaginations of American Jews for a week when it was on CNN 24 hours a day, but now there is no news and people are not into it."

Some groups, such as Americans for a Safe Israel, have heaped heavy criticism on the United Jewish Communities and the federation system for not stepping in to help Jews in need.

The UJC is hoping a resolution passed at its annual governance meetings in late January is a step in the right direction.

Even though the evacuation was handled with "extraordinary grace," the two-page resolution says, 90 per cent of the evacuated settlers still haven't been resettled in permanent housing.

The resolution calls on the federation system, the Jewish Agency for Israel, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and the Israeli government to examine the situation further.

It calls for the Jewish Agency and the JDC to "monitor the situation, develop expertise in the needs so that the system is appropriately informed, and to help ensure that a concerted effort is maintained to enable this population to successfully restore their lives in Israeli society as quickly as possible."

It also calls for UJC to support the government in caring for evacuees' needs.

"The resolution itself is an indication that UJC and the federation system take seriously the fact that the former residents of Gaza and northern Samaria have been underserved," Doron Krakow, UJC's vice-president for Israel and overseas, told JTA, using the Hebrew term for the West Bank.

The UJC and individual federations have provided about $2 million (US) for the evacuees. Some $400,000 of that came from the UJC's $250 million annual overseas budget to pay for trauma counselling.

The rest of the money came from Jewish federations in New York, Chicago, Toronto, New Jersey, Houston, Portland, Ore., and elsewhere for specific projects.

Some federations, including some that gave of their own funds, have been pushing the UJC to aid evacuees. But Krakow said the resolution was not passed due to outside pressure.

The UJC most likely will give more as evacuees' requests for help keep growing.

"It's fair to say that we anticipate additional funding at least on the same magnitude" as the $2 million the federation system already has given, Krakow said.

The resolution comes after internal publication of a three-month UJC study into the evacuees' plight. That study says SELA, the Israeli government's relocation agency, claims 75 per cent of the evacuees have re-entered the work force and 85 per cent should rejoin by the middle of this year. But the Gush Katif Committee, made up of ex-settlers, says only 55 per cent of evacuees have found work.

It could be several years before the evacuees fully integrate into their new communities, according to Talia Levanon, director of the Israel Trauma Coalition, an umbrella group of approximately 50 non-governmental agencies that provides counselling and other services after disasters around the world.

The coalition received the $400,000 in UJC money to help residents removed from their homes and $100,000 from the Chicago federation before the evacuation to help Gazans move burial sites.

According to Levanon, many evacuees say the trauma of eviction is causing their families to disintegrate.

WEIGHTCARE: A PLAN DESIGNED TO LOSE WEIGHT – AND KEEP IT OFF

WHY DOES WEIGHTCARE WORK? BECAUSE IT'S THE ONLY PLAN THAT'S PERSONALIZED TO YOUR METABOLISM

WeightCare gives you what you need to lose it and keep it off, because it teaches you how to leave behind old habits that have steered you away from a healthy lifestyle. Founded by Dr. David Macklin, one of Canada's leading physicians in the field of weight management, WeightCare is different than virtually all other plans in that it finally addresses what medical studies insist are the 4 key areas for successful long-term weight management: healthy diet, behavioural training, physical activity and medical counselling.

And WeightCare offers the support essential for success, partnering you with your own team, including:

- a personal physician
- a registered dietitian
- a personal trainer

This team works with you every step of the way through a comprehensive weight management plan designed specifically for you. They help identify obstacles preventing you from eating well and being active, while also helping you develop long-term skills needed to overcome them.

Knowing your metabolic rate is Step 1 to success

WHY IS KNOWING YOUR INDIVIDUAL METABOLISM SO VITAL TO SUCCESS?

Because having an accurate measurement of your metabolism is essential to developing a plan that's truly personalized to you. Without knowing that number, you are playing a guessing game; one that you're doomed to lose.

This is why WeightCare begins your plan with an accurate measurement of your metabolic rate using the most advanced medical equipment available.

VISIT THE NEW BATHURST & LAWRENCE LOCATION FOR A FREE CONSULTATION

Historian traces origins of America's role in the Mideast

BY SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The genesis of Michael Oren's latest book, Power, Faith and Fantasy: America in the Middle East, 1776 to the Present, can be traced back to a Princeton University classroom some 25 years ago.

The professor whose course on the modern Middle East he was taking said that veterans of the U.S. Civil War had helped modernize Egypt's army and set up literacy schools.

Oren, who was then completing his PhD degree, found that nugget of information new and fascinating, having assumed that American involvement in the Middle East had begun much later, during the Cold War.

Out of curiosity, Oren scoured a library on campus in an attempt to learn more about the vets who had assisted Egypt a century before, but he came up empty. That convinced him that a comprehensive book turning on the historic role of the United States in the Mideast was long overdue.

But it was not until after the Sept. 11, 2001, Arab terrorist attacks in the United States that Oren was able to follow through. Having been asked by an editor what was the one book on the Mideast that had yet to be written, Oren remembered that graduate seminar at Princeton.

Michael Oren

And so Power, Faith and Fantasy was born.

Now a senior fellow at the right-of-centre Shalem Center in Jerusalem, Oren, 51, spent several years researching and writing it.

He consulted a succession of archives and libraries in the United States and Israel, pored over primary sources, read hundreds of books about the Mideast and combed unpublished dissertations.

The sheer magnitude of the materials he immersed himself in was daunting, admitted Oren, who was in Toronto last week to publicize his book.

Three challenges loomed as he began writing it.

Apart from having to master an array of sources, Oren had to find a way of "binding" the narrative with distinctive interlocking themes. He did so by concentrating on three motifs – power, faith and fantasy – which are emblazoned on the book cover.

Once this problem was resolved, Oren, who describes himself as "a proud, unapologetic Zionist," aimed at achieving balance and credibility.

"My prejudices may poke through," he acknowledged. Yet overall, Power, Faith and Fantasy is a rigorous work of even-handed scholarship.

Oren, a native of New Jersey, said that it is pro-American, but not propagandistic.

"The U.S. has done more good than bad in the Middle East," he observed, saying that Americans built universities, hospitals, roads and factories there, and that the American government played a role in securing the independence of Syria, Iran and Israel.

"But in its desire to maintain stability and the flow of oil, the U.S. has supported dictatorships and overthrown an Iranian regime," added Oren, who describes himself as a centrist in political terms.

The third challenge he faced was stylistic. Oren, also a novelist, knew that the book had to be both academic and entertaining in tone. "So much history is dull and unaccessible," he noted. So he opted for a novelistic approach. "I wanted people to read my book."

He believes that Power, Faith and Fantasy – which is scheduled to be translated into Hebrew in 2008 – has met all of his original objectives.

"I hope I've started a new field," said Oren, whose favourite historical figure is Orde Wingate, the legendary pro-Zionist British army officer who was killed on a mission in southeastern Asia during World War II. "Maybe other authors will write books on the same topic."

Oren's previous work, Six Days of War: June 1967, won the National Jewish Book Award, and was a bestseller, having sold 250,000 copies, mainly in the United States and Europe.

When Oren started Six Days of War, he realized that 400 titles on that subject had already rolled off the presses in various languages, but he knew that none had examined that conflict comprehensively from the Israeli and Arab perspectives.

Oren, who wrote his PhD on the origins of the 1956 Arab-Israeli war, said that Six Days of War examined that conflict through a different prism in that it was based on Israeli, Arab, U.S., British and Russian documents.

Oddly enough, sales were flat in Israel. "Israelis are so consumed by the present that they can't focus on the past," he said, sighing in exasperation.

A regular contributor to major U.S. publications ranging from The New Republic to the New York Times, Oren plans to write his next book on Israel's 1948 War of Independence. He had intended to produce a study of the Yom Kippur War until he realized that Israel had not released the primary sources.

"The 1948 war lies at the centre of the legitimacy of the Jewish state," he explained. "But everyone has forgotten it. This was a brutal war and, for Israel, not an easy one. Israel, in May and June, came very close to being defeated when the Egyptian army advanced on Tel Aviv, only to be stopped by four Israeli Messerschmidts."

He hopes to get on with that project before the veterans of that war die off.

Oren, who lives in Jerusalem with his American-born wife, Sally, and their three children, made aliyah in 1979. "I always knew I'd make it to Israel," said Oren, who was active in Zionist youth groups and went off to a kibbutz at 15.

His parents, however, were not active Zionists. "Up until five years ago, my father offered to build me a house anywhere in North America if I came back. Now he's reconciled himself to it."

Oren's early days in Zion were rough, he admitted. "I moved to Israel with only a backpack and no money, and I had no family in Israel."

Joining the army shortly after his arrival, he trained as a paratrooper. He fought in the 1982 war in Lebanon and claims that he was in the first Israeli jeep to have reached Beirut.

He supported the first phase of Israel's invasion, but not the occupation of Beirut. "That was nuts."

The net results of the war were decidedly mixed. "We achieved peace for Galilee for 18 years, but we unleashed the genie of Hezbollah."

Oren, who has attained the rank of major in the reserves, was an Israel Defence Forces spokesperson during last summer's war in Lebanon. "We won militarily, but lost politically," he said.

He fears that Israel and Iran – Hezbollah's ally and arms supplier – are on a collision course over Iran's determination to build a nuclear arsenal. In his view, there is "a real possibility" that Israel will eventually attack Iran's nuclear facilities unless Tehran changes course.

Celebrate with the Stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 20 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 10 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Wednesday, March 21, 2007 at Meron Banquet Hall. It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:00 p.m. This year Ines DiSanto Couture will be presenting their 2007 bridal collection on a fabulous runway fashion show, which will begin promptly at 8 p.m.

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-669-0777.

Artist donates half of exhibit's proceeds to DJCS

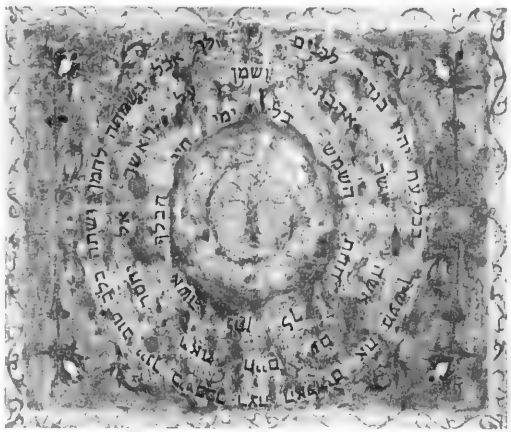
By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN

Special to The CJN

Myriam Nafte is a visual artist who is inspired by medieval illuminated Jewish manuscripts and the hand-painted east European synagogues of the 17th century.

"Most of my work now is Hebrew text as imagery," said Nafte, a forensic anthropologist who has exhibited anatomically correct paintings and drawings of the human body.

The Toronto-based mother of two has been working as a full-time artist for 20 years. However, it is only in the last seven years that she has had an interest in Judaica, "going back to her roots," as she puts it.



[Artwork by Myriam Nafte]

An exhibit of Nafte's Judaica, titled "Eat Your Bread With Joy," opens at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre at 11 a.m. on Feb. 18. The show runs until March 4.

The Judaica series explores the design and meaning of midrash as imagery and its inherent connection with the Hebrew ideal of beauty and spirituality, Nafte says.

Fifty per cent of the show's proceeds will benefit the Downtown Jewish Community School (DJCS).

Nafte says she is happy to support the supplementary school because she believes in Jewish education. "They are needing help to keep the DJCS running. It's one of the only independent religious schools, and it's used by so many young Jewish families in the downtown Toronto area."

Raised in an Orthodox family, Nafte, 42, grew up on Cecil Street in the Kensington Market area, where her parents settled after emigrating from Morocco in 1952.

"I'm very inspired by his work," says Nafte, noting that her father has had many commissions from the local shuls and he continues to do customized ketubot on parchment.

In 2000, she apprenticed with him to learn how to do halachically correct Hebrew text.

She says doing the Hebrew lettering properly is more challenging than the detailed anatomical drawing she does in forensics. "There are rules and regulations around the lines and points of the letters.

"My father has been very supportive. He checks all my layouts to make sure it's all 'kosher.'"

Nafte began her visual-arts studies at the Toronto School of Art and the Ontario College of Art (now the Ontario College of Art and Design), but she switched to the University of Toronto because she wanted more formal and intense science training so that she could learn to do anatomically correct drawings.

Her study of human anatomy and skeletal biology led to the field of physical anthropology and forensics, and she went on to do graduate studies in forensic anthropology at McMaster University.

Today, Nafte continues to do forensic work, teaches forensics courses at George Brown College and Ryerson University and acts as a consultant to various police departments. Her book, Flesh and Bone: An Introduction to Forensic Anthropology (Carolina Academic Press), was published in 2000.

But she stresses that art is her first love. "In my heart, visual arts is my life's calling."

She says she is grateful that her Judaica pieces have been so well received.

She has had two exhibitions at Holy Blossom Temple and two at synagogues in Montreal, and she has upcoming shows at American Jewish museums in New York, San Francisco and Denver.

"In the U.S., there's been great interest in my work, especially in the Jewish museum galleries. It's been very nice," she says.

People have also purchased her work online, Nafte notes. "I'm surprised because it is so textured – you don't see that online, nor do you see the details and the scale, because the work is quite large."

To view the works in the exhibition on-line, go to www.myriamnafte.com. For more information about the exhibit, contact Joan Schoenfeld at 416-924-6211, ext. 112.

THE CENTER FOR LEADERSHIP INITIATIVES

Program Manager

The Center for Leadership Initiatives, Inc. (CLI) is a U.S.-based operating foundation promoting managerial and organizational excellence among current and future leaders of the Jewish non-profit world. CLI seeks a full-time Program Manager based in its Vancouver office.

Responsibilities include design and implementation of professional development and networking retreats and conferences. Top candidates will have experience in the Jewish organizational world; experience in event planning and execution; demonstrated ability to manage projects; excellent verbal and written communication skills; outstanding interpersonal skills; and the capacity to multi-task on a diverse portfolio. The position necessitates 2-5 days per month of travel and the desire to be part of a start-up leadership organization. Applicant's legal status must enable them to work in Canada.

Interested applicants should submit a resume and a writing sample to jobs@leadingup.org by February 28, 2007.

Musical to raise funds for Pediatric Oncology Group

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

A collection of savvy performers will take to the stage from Feb. 21-24 to dazzle audiences and benefit a worthy cause by presenting a series of performances of the classic Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat.

This fifth annual charitable theatre event, put on by Fallen Rock Productions in association with Effort Trust, will benefit the Pediatric Oncology Group of Ontario (POGO).

"Audiences will enjoy a professional theatrical performance… and feel great about the fact that while they're enjoying themselves, they're also supporting a wonderful cause," said associate producer Ferne Cohen.

The play, first performed in 1968, is a witty and creative take on the story of the biblical character Joseph, who is sold into slavery by his jealous brothers, but later gains prominence after displaying his mysterious ability to interpret dreams.

While everyone involved in the production is a volunteer, many of the cast and crew members have formal professional training and experience.

"The majority of people in the cast have theatre training, which brings the production to a tremendous level," said Harvey Cooperberg, who plays the part of Joseph's father, Jacob.

"It's a very professional production."

"We raised a good amount last year, and we'd like to do even better this year," said director Jason Spetter, a lawyer who says Joseph was one of his favourite shows growing up.

The performances will include a matinée for kids that will feature some theatre education.

"School-aged children will be able to come and learn about what it takes to put on a performance," said Cohen, who spearheaded the educational component.

"We will also have a question-and-answer session."

"I love that it incorporates many musical genres, from Elvis to Calypso to rap," he said.

It's been arduous, as they have day jobs and family obligations, but it is clearly a labour of love.

"It's very time-consuming," said Cooperberg, who is a dentist.

Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat will be performed at the Isabel Bader Theatre, located at 93 Charles Street West in downtown Toronto.

For tickets, visit www.uofttix.ca or call 416-978-8849.

For more information about Fallen Rock Productions, visit www.fallenrock.ca.

HAILED AS THE ISRAELI 'JOAN BAEZ,' CHAVA ALBERSTEIN TO PERFORM HERE

"In Israel, Chava Alberstein is Joan Baez and Sarah McLachlan rolled into one: a thoughtful songwriter with folky roots, peaceable instincts, a voice filled with compassion and an earnest desire to improve things," wrote the New York Times. With the huge number of expat Israelis living here, Alberstein has a built-in audience in Toronto, but her music should also appeal to a much broader swath of the community. As the only North American concert date on this visit, she performs at the George Weston Recital Hall, Toronto Centre for the Arts on Feb. 27, 8 p.m. $50-$43. Ticketmaster, 416-872-1111.

Black History Month Concert: You may be forgiven for imagining that any concert titled Voices of the Diaspora... Let My People Go would focus on the Exodus or some later chapter of Jewish history. Actually, it's a work of black history dating from 1937. The historic oratorio by Nathaniel Dett (1882-1943) is being sung by the Nathaniel Dett Chorale, a group dedicated to Afro-centric music including classical, spiritual, gospel, jazz, folk and blues.

The concert includes the oratorio The Ordering of Moses and part of the God's Trombones cycle, Let My People Go, by composer Stewart Goodyear. Tickets range from $41.50 to $24. George Weston Recital Hall, Toronto Centre for the Arts. Feb. 23, 8 p.m. Ticketmaster, 416-872-1111 or www.ticketmaster.ca online.

Ghetto Songs from Montreal: No More Raisins, No More Almonds – Children's Ghetto Songs, a play about the experiences of children and teenagers in the ghettos of Europe during World War II, is to be performed in Toronto after a successful run in Montreal.

The play's title is a reinterpretation of the popular Yiddish lullaby Raisins and Almonds. It features a dozen rare ghetto songs, reflecting the plight of ghetto children, sung in the original Yiddish by 40 Montreal youth.

Written by Holocaust survivor and educator Batia Bettman and directed by Bryna Wasserman, the hour-long play is slated for performance at Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St., on Feb. 27 and 28. Post-performance discussions between actors and audiences should make it an effective educational tool.

Names in the News: Gershon Iskowitz (1921-1988) was a Polish-born Canadian expressionist painter who established a foundation that presents an annual grant of $25,000 to Canadian artists. The winner of the 2007 prize is to be announced in the spring.

The Art Gallery of Ontario recently announced it will exhibit works of future award recipients and will house an Iskowitz archives of his sketchbooks, memorabilia, early works on paper and other items. "The addition of the Iskowitz archives to our collection is a jewel in our crown," said Matthew Teitelbaum, AGO director and CEO.

Born in Kielce, Iskowitz was a Holocaust survivor who immigrated to Canada in 1949, settled in Toronto and began painting landscapes of the city and Parry Sound. A grant from the Canada Council in 1967 enabled him to formalize his expressionistic style. His works are part of numerous collections, including the National Gallery of Canada, the Tel Aviv Museum and the Fort Lauderdale Museum of Art.

• Hannah Moscovitch's award-winning The Russian Play is returning to Harbourfront Centre for a limited run. Set amidst the doomed men and rotten ideals of Stalinist Russia, the play tells the story of a flower-shop girl who falls in love with a gravedigger. The double bill also includes USSR, a dark and funny fable from the depths of glasnost. Harbourfront Centre Studio Theatre, 235 Queen's Quay W. $20. 28-year-old writes about his 'retirement' in Florida

By IRENA KARSHENBAUM
Special to The CJN

Rodney Rothman has lived out my fantasy. Well, sort of. Rodney Rothman retired at the age of 28, while not having been born independently wealthy. The fantasy evaporates when we discover that retirement was spent in a retirement community in Boca Raton, Fla., going on gambling cruises with ridiculously decked ladies of the Red Hat Society and desperately trying to perfect the sport of shuffleboard.

It's not how most 28-year-olds would choose to spend six months of their lives, but it's good that Rothman volunteered to be the guinea pig because how else would us working stiffs get a glimpse into what awaits us after 40 years of involuntary economic slavery?

With so many pensioners determining their activities based on availability of free food and suffering from fashion-sense amnesia, Rothman paints a pretty bleak picture. But somehow he manages to revel in the experience, which showed in his hilarious and addictive memoir that was thankfully devoid of any Hallmark sentimentality and heartwarming sickness.

a memoir of premature retirement rodney rothman
"A hilarious reminder that everybody was young once . . . everyone except Rodney"
– Jon Stewart

A burned-out 28-year-old comedy writer who originally got his start on the Late Night with David Letterman, Rothman had recently lost a television gig. So instead of searching for another 10-hour-a-week job, he decided to retire.

Being Jewish, he believed that he would end up retired in Florida anyway, so why not get a 40-year head start? He found a roommate, a reclusive widow named Margaret who hides cats and birds in her condo against condo regulations, and set about partaking in all that it means to be retired.

He learned that retirees are up really early, jogging, swimming and washing cars at 6:30 a.m. He learned that retirees volunteer as COPs, the sheriff's Citizens Observer Patrol, to keep themselves from being the "Mensch on the Bench," men who accompany their wives on shopping expeditions out of a loss of knowing what to do with their free time. And he learned that he could get aroused dancing with a "sultry" 75-year-old man-eating, husband-collecting vixen named Vivian. No kidding.

I asked Rothman in an e-mail interview if this was possible. He recounted how he would frequent Senior Singles Dance Nights just to see what life would be like when he is older and admitted that "one night, while dancing with a sultry, Sophia Lorenesque woman in her mid-60s, I became shamefully sexually aroused. That's a hard thing to disguise when you are wearing your velour pants. It was totally mortifying."

Rothman also made friends. His best friend was a 93-year-old comedian named Amy Ballinger, whom he still keeps in touch with. He describes her as a "hilarious, outspoken, cackling, extrovert who also carries all this pain in her – she's buried every member of her family, hasn't been married for decades. She slowly watches her health degrade. But to this day remains a person I can go out for brunch or booze with. She'll always teach me an unprintable drinking limerick."

It's nice to know loss of spirit is not necessarily on the agenda once we start hovering around the centennial mark, but it's horrifying to learn that juvenile antics remain. Remember all those excruciating high school cliques that were so nice to abandon in high school? It turns out you can never leave them behind. They have a way of coming full circle once you start sliding down the other end of the age bell curve. Rothman manages to break into the hermetically sealed pool- group circle yet never can crack the canasta clique.

Even though Rothman calls war veterans "The Greatest Generation" and admits that "it's humbling to talk to them about those [World War II] years," he still suffers from the great malaise of his generation – commitment phobia. He blames his lack of success in finding his bashert on victimhood perpetuated by the media, which has brainwashed him with images of the ideal womanhood in the likes of Pamela Anderson and Uma Thurman. So with perfect logic our confused Rothman detours into the arms of a dark-haired, half-Cuban, half-Puerto Rican shiksa.

It has been four years since Rothman's retirement and the 32-year-old reports that he has still not found his bashert, but it may not matter so much at the moment. This is an exciting time for the writer, who is working on a movie version of Early Bird for Paramount Pictures and a new television show and is starting on a new book.

In terms of getting closer to his Jewish roots, Rothman writes, "By spending time in Florida, I was able to reconnect with the kind of outer borough Jews that defined my New York childhood. They're all still down there in Florida, fondling the produce in Publix Supermarket produce aisles. Getting back in touch with my sense memories of that world – the accents, the idioms, the too-much cologne, the overuse of the term of endearment 'fella' – made me appreciate how practical and friendly and funny my older relatives are. I hope that my own generation, a far more independent one that doesn't belong to any clubs other than Netflix, will find a way to save the best ideas of Jewish retirement in retirement. We need to figure out a way to keep calling each other 'fella.'"

Yes, we do, fella. But first we need to see if the reality-TV, me-me-me generation will still be Jewish in 40 years' time.

Author's first novel set in Winnipeg creates a big splash

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Local writer Sidura Ludwig, author of the recently released novel Holding My Breath: A Novel (Key Porter Books), is living a dream come true.

"It is what I've wanted since I could pick up a pen or read a page. I said to myself that one day it would be me," she said.

Now that the book is being picked up by an imprint of Random House, Shaye Areheart Books, in the United States, "it has taken on a life far more than I could imagine. I can't describe [the feeling]."

A wife and mother of a young son, Ludwig was born and raised in Winnipeg, and lived in Birmingham, England, for three years. Her short fiction has appeared in several magazines and anthologies, and she is the recipient of the Canadian Author and Bookman First Prize for Most Promising New Writer.

She is an avid reader, whose favourite books include Marjorie Morningstar, The Colour Purple and Anne of Green Gables.

"I love books that tell people stories, especially ones that give a voice to women," she said.

Spanning three decades, Holding My Breath: A Novel tells the story of Beth Levy, an only child born in the early 1950s, who lives in a north end Winnipeg household with her parents and two aunts.

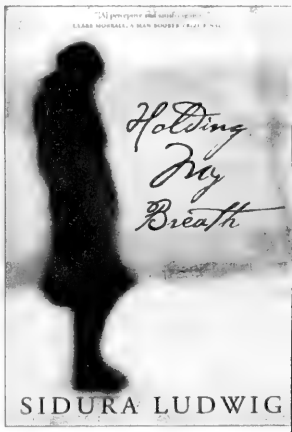
Sidura Ludwig

We meet her mother, who is devoted to her family and anxious to be part of the middle-class Jewish community, and her aunts, one of whom never married and carries a secret from her past. The youngest and most beautiful aunt rebels against her sisters' lifestyles. We also hear about Beth's uncle, who was killed during World War II.

Although not autobiographical – Ludwig was born after the book ends and she did not grow up in the north end – "all writers draw on their own experiences, and I'm always listening to people's stories. I'm interested in how people relate to one another, and how our actions affect another person."

She keeps a journal, she says, and is always writing in her head. "I do my writing whenever I have the blessing to do so, which is almost every day. If I'm lucky, I'll get a four-hour block."

Although Beth's story is not her own story, she said, "there are certain similarities. She had to learn that she could remain devoted to her family while staying true to herself. That is an important lesson for me because my whole family is still in Winnipeg and I live in Toronto."



Her cousin once told her about growing up in her grandfather's house and sharing a bedroom with her aunt, she said. "I was fascinated by the concept and kept wondering about that relationship. That became part of the book."

While living in England, she took part in a book festival, and one of the projects was to choose a photo and write about what she saw. "I chose a picture of a young girl at a swimming pool. My writing turned into a short story and eventually into a chapter of the novel," she said.

Although Ludwig had always wanted to write a novel, she said, the "whole concept frightened me so I started to write closely linked short stories. I got in with a group of writers, though, who said it would be easier to sell a novel, so I started to think of a cohesive story."

The Levy family is her own family now, she said. "I'm not wondering how they are, but I did live with them for five years and I was comfortable with them.

"They were all dreamers. Each character longed for something and for different reasons held back. Beth saw the women struggling in different ways and had to find the courage to carve her own path."

Ludwig is working on a new project now and had to let go of the Levy family. "It's like when you meet new people but still miss your old friends."

Holding My Breath: A Novel is having its Toronto launch on March 7, 8 p.m. in the Leah Posluns Theatre lobby.

On the Road with Rabbi Steinsaltz: 25 Years of Pre-dawn Car Trips, Mind-Blowing Encounters, and Inspiring Conversations with a Man of Wisdom by Arthur Kurzweil (published by Jossey-Bass).

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

"Let my people know" is the chief motto of Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, one of the pre-eminent Talmud sages of our generation and the subject of this engaging book by Arthur Kurzweil.

Arthur Kurzweil (left) looks somewhat like his mentor, Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, for whom he has been a volunteer chauffeur over the last 20 years, whenever the Jerusalem-based Talmudic scholar has visited the New York area.

Widely regarded as a genius, Steinsaltz has penned dozens of books in which he attempts to bring the fire of Jewish mysticism down to earth. For the last 40 years he has also devoted himself to the monumental task of translating and publishing the Talmud for the edification of the masses: his widely hailed "Steinsaltz" edition stands as an astonishing trail-blazing accomplishment, unparallelled, perhaps, until the Schottenstein edition appeared from Art Scroll as the product of a team of rabbis. Largely as a result of these two editions, there are presently more Jews studying Gemarah, daf yomi or otherwise, than at any point in Jewish history.

Deeply affected by Steinsaltz's remarkable and lucid book The Thirteen Petalled Rose, passages from which he could quote by heart, Kurzweil offered to be the holy man's chauffeur on his frequent trips to the New York area. Thirsty for learning and in search of (as he puts it) "a teacher with a capital T," Kurzweil routinely met him at the airport at 5 a.m.

A genealogist and book publisher, Kurzweil's early book on Jewish genealogy, From Generation to Generation, had already become the most popular work in its field. Possessed of the writer's habit, he industriously began to record his various "mind-blowing encounters and inspiring conversations" with his celebrated passenger.

Many illuminating sparks are thrown off in these encounters. Despite a certain propriety, Kurzweil (who has heard Steinsaltz lecture at least 200 times) was rarely at a loss for penetrating questions. The diminutive, bearded rabbi would typically reward him with wise and pithy answers, delivered between puffs of his habitual pipe and with an occasional playful gleam in his eye.

As there was usually much time on the road between appointments, the book provides many examples of the rabbi's luminescence. For instance, his disciple once asked him to elaborate on his comment that the Talmud and Kabbalah are really the same.

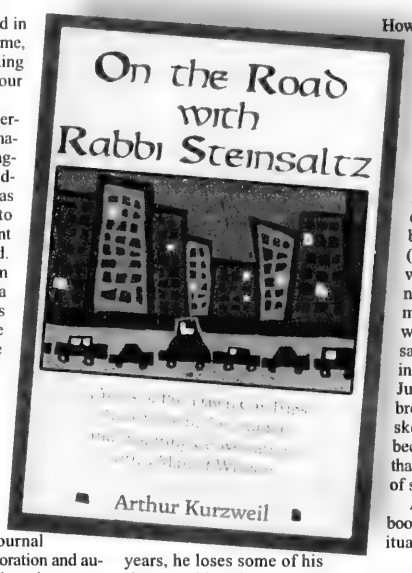
"The commonly held view that Kabbalah and Talmud are in and about different worlds is a misconception," Steinsaltz explained. "It is simply not true. There is an organic unity of the whole. The Kabbalah and the Talmud are different forms of expression of the same thing, but each in its own way.

"There was never a real separation between the daily obligations that we do and the esoteric or mystical aspects of the tradition. They have always been connected. They are different aspects of the same thing."

Although he holds the Jewish people as a unity, Steinsaltz is an adherent of the chassidic branch of Jewry. Kurzweil once took him to meet the charismatic Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Schneerson in Brooklyn: the two exalted personalities greeted each other warmly and the one presented the other with two newly printed volumes of his Talmud edition and readily received the other's blessing.

"A moment before we left, Rabbi Steinsaltz encouraged me to come closer to where the two of them were standing," Kurzweil writes. "He encouraged me to stand in a spot where the Lubavitcher Rebbe looked at me, offered me a blessing, and whispered something into my ear as well: 'Be his driver, but be your own driver. Add more mitzvahs.'"

On later trips, Steinsaltz would visit Schneerson's grave; for him, Chassidism was the normative Jewish tradition, its sphere of influence tragically curtailed by the pogroms, then more radically by the Holocaust. "It is how Judaism has always appeared to me in any significant way," he said. "Looking at Judaism in the recent era without Chassidus would be like looking at the Talmud today and ignoring the Acharonim, the talmudic commentators from the 1600s to the present."



Despite its strong hagiographical tendency, On the Road is also a journal of philosophical exploration and autobiographical reflections that stamp it with the author's personality. Since the book is not a scholarly biography, personal details are sparse about its subject, who was rarely keen to talk about himself. "My biography is simple," he once said. "I was born in Jerusalem, and I still live there. Nothing else is very interesting."

However, we learn that Steinsaltz grew up in a non-observant household, read Marx and Lenin before he read the Bible, and began his Jewish studies as a teenager. His father once said he didn't care if his son became an apikores (heretic) but didn't want him to be an ignoramus. "My mother and father were skeptics," Steinsaltz said in explaining his late entry into Judaism. "They brought me up to be a skeptic. In fact, I became such a skeptic that I became skeptical of skepticism."

A sub-theme of the book is Kurzweil's spiritual growth; over the years, he loses some of his shyness with and awe for his teacher and begins to recognize a parallel authentic quality within himself. Fittingly, the book ends with a telling remark from his mentor as Kurzweil drops him off at his hotel. "I was once worried about you," Rabbi Steinsaltz said. "You used to put me so high. I see that you've grown up a little."

Coach optimistic new facility will help baseball team improve

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Pitchers with the Ontario Blue Jays ought to thank their lucky stars they're not on the staff of the Baltimore Orioles. Sort of.

Unlike Orioles ace Eric Bedard, who prepares for spring training by playing catch with his brother in their cousin's goose barn, pitchers for the Jays have a plush new facility in Mississauga to train in.

While Bedard throws in 5 degree Celsius temperatures, the heat is on at the Jays' facility and they use a professional clay mound to work on their pitches.

The Jays' clubhouse was inaugurated with much fanfare recently and Dan Bleiwas, director of baseball operations for the organization, believes it will be key for the club's development programs.

The Ontario Blue Jays, a collection of the best teenage baseball talent in the Toronto area, are a successful enterprise, with a 100 per cent record of placing their graduates in U.S. colleges and universities, Bleiwas boasted.

In all, 57 Jays have been drafted by major-league organizations while more than 150 have earned scholarships at U.S. schools. The best Jewish player to suit up for the Blue Jays was London native Adam Stern, who came before Bleiwas' tenure and now plays for the Orioles.

Nevertheless, Bleiwas believes Canadians are at a disadvantage when it comes to competing with American players, particularly those from California, Texas and Florida. The new year-round facility will help "mitigate the effects of climate" and improve players' skills, he said.

Bleiwas, who also coaches the Blue Jays' under-18 team, acknowledges "we are limited by climate and our players are behind."

The new training ground, which improves on a smaller facility, allows the 80 players in the Jays organization (they operate under-18, under-17 and under-16 teams) to work out year round as well as improve their baseball skills. In addition to the pitchers' mound, the building includes four batting cages, a turf infield and a state-of-the-art weight room.

The facility is open to local teams and players.

For the athletes in the Jays' organization, baseball is a year-round activity and there's one goal in mind – to get to the 18-and-under World Series.

In March, building on the off-season program, the full complement of players head down to Cocoa Beach, Fla., near Orlando, for 10 days of spring training. The spring/summer season follows, with the team playing in the Premier Baseball League, Ontario's best. For the past three seasons, the Blue Jays have been league champions.

At the end of June, the under-18s drive down to Memphis, Atlanta and Tulsa for three 10-day tournaments in which they compete with top U.S. travel teams. At the end of the summer, they participate in the American Amateur Baseball Congress, the highest calibre event for teenage kids.

In addition, the Blue Jays vie for a spot in the 18-and-under World Series as the northeast region representatives. The Blue Jays have dominated the region in recent years, participating in the 1997, 1998, 2001, 2002 and 2004 events.

Dan Bleiwas

They haven't done so well at the World Series itself, usually losing to teams from the American Sun Belt.

All in all, the Jays play 108 games a year, but despite that hectic schedule, education is stressed. The team provides "study halls" during long road trips and players study while on a bus or in hotel boardrooms.

Players are the creme de la creme of GTA athletes, but they have to be good students too, Bleiwas said.

"We're looking for good athleticism, not necessarily baseball skill. We feel if we get kids young enough, we can teach them." he said.

Though Bleiwas is involved in team administration, "I prefer coaching," he said. "I think that's the fun aspect of it, being on the field, instructing the players."

Bleiwas, 30, admits to having been a rather ordinary player in his youth. He played for Thornhill teams growing up and at 15 he worked at the now-defunct Green Diamond baseball camp, where his brother, David, was director.

Later he played for York University, where he was influenced by the team's head coach, Rick Calich.

"He combined technical knowledge with game knowledge. He was a great organizer and a great motivator, and that's what I strive to be," Bleiwas said.

While playing for York, he also coached Thornhill teams, and after two years at the university, he was coaching there, too.

Around the same time, the Atlanta Braves hired him as a regional scout, and after three years, he switched to the San Diego Padres.

The Maccabi organization recruited him as well, making him coach of the Toronto boys teams at the 1996, 1997 and 1998 JCC Maccabi Games. They won two gold medals and one silver.

Later this year he will serve as Howard Kideckel's assistant with the Canadian Junior team at the Latin American Maccabi Games in Buenos Aires.

He believes the interest of young Jewish athletes in baseball has waned in recent years, corresponding more or less to the lack of success of the Toronto Blue Jays and the popularity of the Toronto Raptors in basketball. But, "with the Toronto Blue Jays improving every year, the excitement in the community is building, and we will see more interest," he predicted.

The Ontario Blue Jays are always interested in talented players, Bleiwas added. Anyone interested in trying out for the team can call 905-507-9393 or visit the team's website at www.ontariobluejays.com.

The care-giving 'It'

By MICHAEL GORDON

Remember the game of tag? Someone is "It," and "It" has the task of tagging someone else in the group, whose members do their best to avoid becoming the new "It."

The Senior Side of Life

According to Wikipedia, there are 44 variants of tag, and the game is played around the world, mostly in playgrounds and schoolyards. There are 16 listed variants of tag that require equipment, but the basic game requires only the players, with their skill and strategies, to transfer their role as "It" to another player.

In the care-giving of aged parents, there is often an "It," the child who takes on the primary responsibility for decision-making and arrangements for aged parents. When in my clinic I ask children who are accompanying parents if they are "It," they often smile knowingly and answer yes. Unlike the playground game, however, it is less often the case that the role of being "It" can be transferred to another member of the family, and if so, not without lots of planning and mutual involvement.

In the bestselling book Family Matters by Canadian author Rohinton Mistry, the experiences of one family's struggles and relationships, which include love, animosity, caring, tragedy, humour and the gamut of human feelings and frailties, are explored as the family takes on the care-giving challenges that children of aging parents experience during their parents' later years.

For many children who face these prospects and realities, the experiences may be perceived by them to be unique, and at times overwhelming. It is not often possible to anticipate all the special nuances and interactions that relate to one's family. Usually what happens depends on the family's makeup and the long-standing relationships that exist between the siblings and the parents for whom care-giving has become necessary. The specifics of each situation reflect the peculiar family dynamics, which affect how children respond to the care-giving challenges and how the challenges affect their own lives.

It is important for caregivers, whether in the primary role as the "It" in the complex dynamic or as one of the other directly or peripherally involved children, to understand the demands and support one another's disparate but often equally and important roles. Sometimes those with the role of "It" acknowledge the exceptional responsibility they feel, and sometimes there is a tinge of resentment toward siblings who are not "It." They may acknowledge their primary role with understanding and appreciation. They have a unique opportunity for profound satisfaction resulting from their primary care-giving role. Sometimes no alternative person exists due to distance or complex family situations.

What I have learned from my geriatric clinic's many patients and families and from the good fortune that I have experienced in my own family is that values and attitudes expressed by families can triumph over complicated care-giving situations. It is important to abide by certain principles that can help everyone cope with difficult circumstances. The most important element in the equation is trust – hopefully everyone is doing the best they can under the circumstances. Whoever has to make a decision when others might not be there for immediate communication should be supported in that decision by the others. It is the process of concerned and deliberative decision making, not outcome, that counts most.

The key to being "It" is to do it with full commitment. Afterward you will live with the memories of the process and the journey. Give it your best, as there is no better alternative. For those who are not the primary "It," support the person in that role; give it your best so that you, too, can feel satisfied in your supportive and important role.

Chicken w/ Raspberry-Red Wine Glaze

4 boneless skinless chicken breast halves
1 tsp garlic salt
1/4 tsp salt

Dash cayenne pepper
1 cup raisins

Heat oven to 450°F. Spray 13"x9" baking pan with cooking spray. Place chicken in pan. Sprinkle both sides with garlic salt, salt & pepper. Bake 10 min

In small saucepan, stir together 1/3 cup wine, raspberry preserves, mustard, 1 tsp vanilla, cayenne pepper. Simmer over medium heat 5 min. or until slightly reduced.

Brush chicken with half of the raspberry mixture; reserve remaining for sauce. Pour 1/3 cup wine into pan with chicken. Bake 10-15 min. or until chicken is no longer pink in centre and juices run clear, brushing chicken with raspberry mixture 2 or 3 times.

In same small saucepan, stir together reserved raspberry mixture, remaining 1/3 cup wine, 1 tsp vanilla and raisins. Simmer over medium heat; cook 2-3 min. or until raisins are plump. Remove from heat.

Ban phones from class – and cars

Epi on Education

There has been much talk lately about banning cellphones from the classroom, and I wish to use this suggestion as an example of the relationship of schools to life.

Seymour Epstein

Let me first admit that I own a cellphone and use it for its efficiency and abuse it for its convenience. But the point is, whether we absolutely needed this technological advance or not, it's here to stay. We now need to learn how to live with it, and some would remove it from the classroom. We have silenced it in the concert hall and the movies. Signs in liberal synagogues beg congregants not to use them in the bathrooms on Shabbat. There is a certain etiquette developing around their use at meetings. The only dangerous place that this particular jurisdiction has not banned the phone from is the moving vehicle. My question is: Which comes first, the car or the classroom?

Can we adults ban the phone from the classroom, where our youth are meant to learn about life, before we prevent it from taking our lives on the open road?

From when Shamai told us in the Mishnah that we should make our Torah a regular part of our life (an open reading of "Aseh Toratcha keva") to when Dewey taught us to make learning a real-life exercise, we have been struggling to make schools less artificial and more like the real thing. Our tradition teaches that talmud Torah is both a mitzvah in its own right and preparation for all the other mitzvot. If we legislate in schools differently than we legislate our lives outside the classroom, we are telling our children that schooling, both in its content and its form, is an artificial reality not to be taken seriously –not now and not later.

Schools that become too distant from real life cease to be the trans-generational link they were meant to be.

I am totally in favour of the classroom ban on cellphones – the day after they are banned from moving vehicles.

Tu b'Shvat — a message for today

By RICHARD ROSENBAUM
Special to The CJN

Tu b'Shvat, the New Year of the trees, has never been as relevant as it is today.

That's the message taken away by the more than 200 people who packed the Minsk Synagogue in Toronto's Kensington Market, where the Jewish environmental organization Torat Ha'Teva held its Tu b'Shvat seder on Feb. 3. The crowd was diverse, with young and old in attendance, dressed in every style from cargo pants to chassidic black hats, but they were there for a single purpose.

Tu b'Shvat, the 15th day of the month of Shvat, was celebrated in biblical times as the first day that any new fruits that grew had to be tithed for the following year. The holiday lost much of its significance after the exile from the land of Israel, but following the Spanish Inquisition, Kabbalists who had moved to the mystical city of Safed revived the ancient festival and created a Tu b'Shvat seder, modelled after the Passover seder. For centuries, this practice remained fairly obscure, but it has recently regained its importance as an environmental festival, celebrating our connection to the world and our responsibility to take care of it.

The evening was co-sponsored by the Birthright Alumni Community, Mosaic Outdoor Club of Ontario and Chabad at York (University), and conducted by alumni of the Teva Learning Centre, an institute in Connecticut that offers environmental education programming for many Jewish schools.

Rabbi Beckerman of Chabad at York opened the event with a brief dvar Torah on the Jewish mandate to protect our environment. Then the festivities began, with the main part of the evening devoted to the seder.

The seder is divided into four parts, representing the kabbalistic "Four Worlds," the main stages in the creative process resulting from the progressive self-screening of the Divine light. In descending order, they are Atzilut (the world of emanation), Briah (the world of creation), Yetzirah (the world of formation), and Asiyah (the world of action). Each part transitioned beautifully into the next with choruses of singing and drumming.

The tables were filled with delicious food and drink, and fresh and dried fruits, nuts, cookies and juices were served around the room, with each fruit and each mixture of grape juice symbolic of the kabbalistic sephirot (the 10 concepts of God) and the different levels of reality or consciousness expressed through the concept of the Four Worlds.

The program was interactive and thought-provoking, with the assembled group encouraged to consider and discuss what each of us was already doing and what we could begin to do to protect the world. With that in mind, it's fitting that all the cups used for this event were recyclable and bio-degradable to reduce waste.

Coby Segal, one of the seder leaders, walked the group through a meditative visualization exercise intended to increase our mindfulness, to remind us to have kavanah, or intention, when we partake of the things that we derive from the earth, so as not to take them for granted but instead to accept them as a holy gift.

After the seder, the party continued into the night with music provided by violin and accordion, a rousing drumming circle courtesy of the Halleluja Drummers, singing and dancing (even breakdancing!).

It is right and natural that the Jewish community should have a response to the threats facing our environment today.

"We wanted to get across that Judaism is incredibly rich in environmental tradition," said Risa Strauss, one of the seder's organizers. "Responsibility comes from awareness, and we wanted to show that, by increasing our awareness of environmental issues we can learn to take greater responsibility for them, and help save the planet."

Manitoba NDP officially condemns all Shoah denial

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

As reported in brief by The CJN last week, on Feb. 4, Manitoba's ruling New Democrats passed a party resolution condemning all forms of Holocaust denial at their annual convention in Winnipeg.

The proposal was brought to the floor as an emergency resolution by Christine Melnick, the province's minister of water stewardship, and seconded by Darlene Dziewit, president of the Manitoba Federation of Labour.

Christine Melnick

Melnick said she was particularly motivated to prioritize this motion by the recent "despicable" Holocaust denial conference in Iran.

"The denial of true history, which includes the Holocaust, is something that cannot be supported or tolerated in any way," Melnick said. "I'm not going to put up with it or sit on the sideline and shake my head from the armchair. It's important for Jews, but more so for non-Jews to stand up and say, 'We're not accepting this.'"

The NDP motion also states that Holocaust denial activities increase the risk of it happening again, and that remembering the Shoah is "critical to prevent further acts of genocide."

Its final statement reads, "...we reject and condemn without reservation any denial of the Holocaust as a historical event, either in full or in part, or any activities to this end."

It was passed unanimously by the more than 600 delegates at the convention, said Melnick.

Melnick also based the resolution on recent events at the UN General Assembly on Jan. 27.

UN Resolution 60/7, which condemns the denial of the Holocaust and proclaims Jan. 27 as the International Day of Commemoration in memory of the victims of the Holocaust, was passed last Jan. 27, by 103 sponsor states, including Canada.

Upon her motion's ratification, Melnick suggested her party was unique in having passed such a resolution and hoped it would set an example for other political parties to follow, both nationally and worldwide.

"I think the motion put forward by the Manitoba NDP is important in and of itself but also within the context of the times," Rudner told The CJN, on the same day that noted Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel was sentenced to five years imprisonment in Germany for his activities.

"This motion is rooted in the circumstances of the world as we know it and I think it's important for organizations to stand up for what they believe in and against racism in all its forms. And Holocaust denial is anti-Semitism and is a form of racism," Rudner said.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Commission Praised

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, welcomed the Charest government's creation of a commission to study the controversial issue of reasonable accommodation of religious minorities in the province. CJC offered to co-operate in its work. "Quebec has been engaged in a long debate that is both necessary and unavoidable in a democratic society," said regional CJC president Jeffrey Boro. "We have a charter of rights and freedoms, to which the Jewish community fully subscribes, to guide us in this sensitive and complex debate on the role and the value of reasonable accommodation." The commission, led by academics Gerard Bouchard and Charles Taylor, is to begin its work next month.

Scholarships Available

MONTREAL — The Concordia Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies is accepting applications for four awards and fellowships worth up to $7,500 for graduate research at Concordia University. Deadline is April 30. For details, visit www.concordia.ca/jchair.

WORLD

School Makes Top 500

MONTEVIDEO — A Jewish-run school in Uruguay was named one of world's top 500 universities. Universidad ORT in Montevideo ranked 329th in the Times of London's Higher Education Supplement. It's the first time a Uruguayan university was included in the survey, which looks at 25,000 schools. "We are extremely proud to be selected among the top 10 universities in Latin America, along with many prestigious schools," ORT President Jorge Grunberg said.

Youths Get Jail Time

MOSCOW — Five Russian teens received jail terms Feb. 9 for killing a Jewish man with a metal cross. A court in Yekaterinburg handed down terms ranging from five to 10 years for the five, aged 12 to 17. They were drunk in October 2005 when they met a 21-year-old Jewish man, beat him, dragged him to a cemetery and stabbed him to death with a cross taken from a headstone.

Shoah Report Issued

BRUSSELS — Belgium issued a report last week about its collaboration with the Nazis in World War II. Docile Belgium says anti-Semitism among its elites made Belgium ripe for helping to carry out the Shoah. "Belgium adopted a docile attitude providing collaboration unworthy of a democracy in diverse and crucial areas for a disastrous policy toward Belgian and foreign Jews," says the 1,114-page report by the Centre for Historical Research and Documentation on War and Contemporary Society. Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt wants the findings incorporated into the country's schoolbooks.

Interfaith Radio

LONDON — A Jewish-Muslim Internet radio station is up and running in Britain. Salaam Shalom Radio, which went online Feb. 1 in Bristol, will play music and programs about Jewish and Muslim life to "allow two cultures which have been linked for thousands of years to talk together and share their experiences," its website says. The station is part of the Salaam Shalom project, which urges dialogue and understanding between Muslims and Jews.

Gang Head Sentenced

PARIS — The leader of France's racist and anti-Semitic Tribu Ka gang was sentenced Feb. 9 to five months in jail by a court near Paris. Stellio Capo Chichi, a.k.a. Kemi Seba, 25, was found to be in criminal contempt of the law for calling a public official "Zionist scum." He was arrested Feb. 8 after an altercation with police. After a May 2006 rally that saw 40 Tribu Ka members march through a Jewish area calling for death to Jews, the group was dissolved by Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy. It was then re-formed under the name Generation Kemi Seba.

Philanthropist Supported Jewish Education

Florence Zacks Melton

The Columbus, Ohio, resident was an inventor, businesswoman and Jewish education activist who established the Florence Melton Adult Mini-Schools.

In 1980, Melton worked with local Jewish federations to open the schools in three pilot cities, offering Jewish education to adults. There are now 62 such schools around the world, including in Toronto and Montreal, serving 5,500 students a week, making it the world's largest pluralistic adult education network.

In 1947, Melton, who was born in Philadelphia, founded the R.G. Barry Corp. footwear company with her husband Aaron Zacks and another partner. She had six grandchildren and 10 great-grandchildren.

Tories, faith groups demand an end to government's discriminatory school funding

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Ontario's Conservative Opposition education critic is on a mission to revamp what he calls the province's discriminatory faith-based education funding system.

Late last year, Frank Klees, MPP for Oak Ridges, tabled a petition in the legislature calling for the Liberal government to finally end the province's practice of publicly funding both Roman Catholic schools and secular schools equally.

"We call on the Ontario legislature to pass legislation to provide equitable funding in respect of all faith-based schools in Ontario without religious discrimination and without any reduction in funding for public education, with accountability requirements and standards in place to ensure that the public interest is safeguarded," read the petition.

Jewish schools and schools of other faiths receive no public funding, forcing parents to pay prohibitive tuition fees in order to educate their children, while the government continues using their tax dollars to fund Roman Catholic schools.

The province argues it has a clear mandate to obey the 1867 Constitution, which sought to protect existing rights for denominational schools of the time, requiring Ontario to maintain a publicly funded Roman Catholic system.

Frank Klees

In 1999, the United Nations Human Rights Committee (UNHRC) ruled this funding was discriminatory, violating Canada's obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, saying the need to protect Roman Catholic funding was now out of context with modern times.

The UNHRC censured the province again on this issue in a 2005 report.

"I can tell you that I have had no response from [Ontario Education Minister Kathleen Wynne]," Klees said. "I've questioned the minister specifically relating to these petitions... it's very clear that this Liberal government is not prepared to consider this."

Klees believes it's an issue that needs closure and will become more important as the provincial election approaches on Oct. 10.

"There's no doubt that this will be an election issue," Klees said. "[The current petition] is only one in a series of many that I and some of my colleagues have presented through the official Opposition over the last year and a half."

Klees said he and Conservative Opposition leader, John Tory, continue to conduct stakeholder meetings to determine what a fair education funding policy would look like under a Tory government.

Wynne could not be reached for comment.

Stones and the human heart

(Fourth in a series)

From the editor's desk

On the fifth day of our short stay in Jerusalem last month as guests of the Jerusalem Foundation, our small group of journalists visited the Kotel, the Western Wall.

We arrived early in the morning. The sun was still nearer to the beginning of its climb to the high spot directly above us in Jerusalem's azure sky. Not even the slightest puff of a cloud encumbered our view of its trajectory toward the far-off horizon of the sea that it would reach and then touch in about eight hours.

It was Thursday.

The Kotel and the adjacent plaza were a hubbub of prayer and festival. Cameras clicked and videos whirred like a choir of constant crickets on a pleasant Ontario summer's eve.

We heard singing and dancing, tambourines and cymbals and even the occasional velvet proclamations of the shofar. Mothers and grandmothers, sisters and aunts announced the arrival, if not yet the coming of age, of the awkward yet smiling 13-year-old boys in their familial midst. And in the ecstatic custom of the women of the north African Sephardi world, they chanted and clapped and yelped the joyful, laryngeal ululations that announced their happiness.

We saw a number of different family circles celebrating bar mitzvahs throughout the plaza. Different languages – French, Spanish, English, Russian and, of course, Hebrew – careened into each other at the edges of those circles like musical bumper cars in a symphonic playground.

The Kotel and the plaza tingled that warm Thursday morning with the raw emotion of hundreds of human beings in thrall with the moment and very aware that they were holding onto something so very precious and that they would soon relinquish to memory and then, one day, sadly, lose.

We were apart from the various celebrations, yet, patently, part of them as well, standing shoulder to shoulder with countless strangers in the full flush of utter happiness.

One of our group, a first-time visitor to Jerusalem, crumpled under the weight of the emotion, overwhelmed by things he was suddenly seeing clearly.

He could not hold back the tears that accompanied thoughts of his father. "He will never be able to visit Jerusalem," our colleague wept. "He will now have to see the city and touch these stones through my eyes and my heart."

After we collected our thoughts and our emotions and walked through the awe-inspiring tunnels underneath the shops and homes of the Old City, northward along the finished face and gigantic stones of the Western Wall, we paid a visit to Rabbi Shmuele Rabinowitz, the rabbi of the Western Wall and holy sites in Israel.

The diminutive young rabbi has been responsible for the administration of the Western Wall for 11 years. He spoke emphatically, directly locking eyes on each one us in the group. He spoke with a sense of poetry and grace.

"This place, the Kotel," he said, "is first and foremost a place of prayer. People come here to reconnect, to cry, to feel and to be part of a moment of uplifting heavenliness.

Rabbi Shmuele Rabinowitz

"For some people, a visit brings with it a sense of identity and association with our people. For others, it evokes a release, a defining instant of catharsis, bewilderment and belonging all at the same time. Something happens here even to individuals who have had no active connection with their past. There is often an awakening in souls that have been Jewishly dormant."

Quoting the late and revered Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, the first Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Eretz Yisrael, Rabbi Rabinowitz said, "There are some stones that seem to have the heart of a human being; and there are some human beings, alas, who have a heart of stone."

"But these are no ordinary stones. They are the remnant of the Holy Temple and we believe because of that, there remains here a lingering sense of the holy."

Rabbi Rabinowitz asked us to carry back a message to the Jewish community in Canada: "It is inconceivable that a Jew – child or adult – will not have been to Jerusalem to see, to behold the Western Wall, at least once in his or her life," he said.

"Especially in these times, as we soon mark the 40th year of the city's reunification, it is important for people to come here to try to understand and connect at this very unique place with the yearning of generations past for this very spot."

Over the years, the young rabbi of the Kotel had received and hosted heads of state, heads of government, politicians and public figures, high religious authorities, Hollywood stars, athletic heroes, and now, too, a small grateful group of journalists from Canada.

After 30 minutes, our visit ended. We were calmer and more emotionally collected, but rather still in awe of the place and the moment.

AFFIXING PRESCHOOL MEZUZOT: When Linda Wolfe, the Bialik Hebrew Day School preschool co-ordinator for many years, retired in June 2005, her friends and colleagues contributed to the school's Mezuzah Fund in her honour. On Feb 7, Wolfe affixed a mezuzah to each entrance to the Bialik preschool. The school welcomed Linda back, along with her husband, Gordy, and their children and grandchildren.

Time to address 'the elephant in the room'

In reply to CJN queries, a spokesperson from the minister's office issued the following response, indicating it was presented in the legislature in reply to Klees' petition.

"The government has no intention of funding private religious schools. Our government recognizes the right of parents to choose alternative forms of education for their children... however, our clear focus and our government's priority continues to be introducing measures that significantly improve the publicly funded system."

Ontario Education Minister Kathleen Wynne

It went on to say that the government will continue to maintain its constitutional school funding obligations.

Many groups have been fighting for equitable funding for years.

In 2004, the Multi-Faith Coalition for Equal Funding of Religious Schools (MFC), a grassroots movement representing Jews, Sikhs, Muslims and an assortment of non-Catholic Christians, drafted a detailed proposal suggesting how to extend funding to religious schools.

The province's education ministry acknowledged receipt of the proposal, but Gerard Kennedy, then education minister, never responded to the MFC.

According to Gila Martow, an outspoken representative with Parents for Equality in Education Funding (PEEF), an affiliate of the MFC, there's been little to no response from the province since, despite repeated attempts at contact.

The MFC recently sent an invitation to Wynne to participate in an upcoming MFC symposium on April 16, regarding the issue.

"Her office said they received the invitation and are 'looking at her schedule' now to see if she can attend. But we still haven't been able to arrange any meetings or speak to her," Martow said.

Martow said PEEF respects the minister and doesn't blame Wynne for the current situation, but added that the time to address "the elephant in the room" has come.

Similarly, Ontario's Canadian Jewish Congress, in a joint effort with the various UJA Federations of Ontario, has also been hard at work addressing this issue.

Former Ontario Education Minister Gerard Kennedy

Steven Shulman, regional director of the CJC, noted that for the last two years his team has consulted with the province's Jewish day school leaderships, diverse faith groups, government officials and many other stakeholders on how to move forward on education funding.

"This is a primary advocacy issue for this community and a vital time leading up to a [provincial] election," Shulman said. "We want to find the approach that gives us the best opportunity for funding, while... being good public policy for Ontario."

In a nutshell, the CJC is pushing for Jewish and other faith-based schools to be adopted as full participants in the public school sphere, suggesting their faith curricula and values could only add to the Canadian mosiac.

"Bringing Catholic schools into the public sphere grew the public sphere," Shulman said. "If we want to grow public education again, a very important way to do it, would be to bring the remaining variety of faith-based schools that are willing to meet appropriate accountability standards, into the public sphere."

Shulman acknowledged this as a work-in-progress, but said other groups have been receptive to the idea.

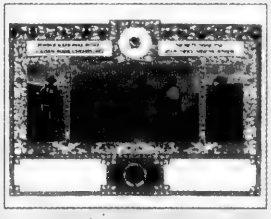
GOLDEN BOOK OF MARRIAGE

(11"x 14")

When a Jewish couple stands under the wedding chupah, they affirm their love for one an-other, for their people and for their land - the Land of Israel. Record this love for all time by inscribing the newlyweds in the Golden Book of Marriage, housed in Jerusalem. Couples celebrating their Silver, Golden or any anniversary can also be honoured by an inscription in the Golden Book of Marriage. Each couple is presented with a beautiful JNF certificate in recognition of the Marriage Book of inscription.

Contribution: $200



GOLDEN BOOK

(14" x 11")

Theodore Herzl was the first to honour the list of JNF's Golden Book - followed by legions of ardent supporters of Israel. Any momentous occasion can be recorded for posterity. The memory of a loved one can be inscribed for all time in the Golden Book in JNF's headquarters in Jerusalem. You will receive the Golden Book certificate-a beautiful document evoking the spirit of Zionism's pioneers and a symbol of an ongoing commitment to that spirit.

Contribution: $180

BAR/BAT MITZVAH

(11"x 8.5")

The occasion of the Bar/Bat mitzvah happens once in the lifetime of a Jewish boy or girl. What better way to mark their coming of age than to have their names inscribed in the Sefer Bar/Bat Mitzvah of JNF...preserved in the archives of the JNF in Jerusalem. The youngster receives a pin and a personalized certificate attesting to his/her inscription to the Sefer Bar/Bat Mitzvah in Jerusalem.

Sad results, but expected

These words were written mere moments after U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas at the David Citadel Hotel in Jerusalem last Monday morning. The trilateral meeting was the latest effort by the Bush administration to show the Arab world that it is actively trying to bring about a resolution to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. It was also a very visible attempt to lend both American and Israeli support to the floundering Palestinian leader.

Moreover, and quite determinative for Israel, the parties in Mecca did not agree – nor does it appear that they ever intended to agree – to an explicit statement committing the new Palestinian government to accept the three conditions laid down by the Quartet (the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations) as the sine qua non for advancing the peace process between the Palestinians and Israelis: recognizing Israel, renouncing terror and honouring previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

The Mecca agreement may have been an effective prop in trying to bring about an end to the killing between Hamas and Fatah – although this too remains to be seen – but as an instrument of bilateral diplomacy between Palestinians and Israelis it is a vacuous, useless piece of paper. Worse. It signaled the ascendancy of Hamas over Fatah. Merely hours after the signing of the Mecca accord, Hamas leaders reiterated that they would never recognize Israel. The accord, therefore, succeeded yet again, in effectively enshrining the destruction of Israel and the genocide of the Jews in Israel as the national aspiration of the Palestinian people, now under a form of unity government.

The United States has assured Israel that it will not budge from requiring the new Palestinian government to accept and adopt the three Quartet conditions. It is thus difficult to see what progress was expected from the Monday meeting. The Mecca accord provides no basis for moving forward.

Abbas has no authority to make any decisions. Olmert has no desire to. In the absence of a true peace-seeking governing Palestinian entity, any decisions by Olmert would constitute unilateral initiatives by Israel. And that is a policy the Israeli public will no longer sanction.

At the end of the two-hour tri-partite meeting on Monday, Rice told the waiting press that the two leaders had agreed to meet again and that she would join with them when they do.

How sad for the people embroiled in the conflict, especially the Palestinians.

Thank you to our government for moving Ontario's election date to Oct. 10 to avoid election day falling on a major Jewish holiday ("Ontario vote changed to avoid Shemini Atzeret," CJN, Feb. 15). All Ontarians benefit when all voters are able to participate fully in elections.

However, postponing election day does not fully solve the problem. Five out of eight of the projected elections after 2007 are scheduled on a Jewish holiday of some sort. And in many elections, including 2007, the majority of days in the election campaign will be days on which it will be impossible or difficult for Jews to fully participate in election-related activities without compromising observance.

This concerns all Jews, not just the Orthodox as suggested in the government's statement. Both organizations representing the religious leaders of the full spectrum of Toronto synagogues, including the Vaad HaRabbonim, have written requesting changes to the Elections Act so that Ontario's fixed election period will not perpetually conflict with the major Jewish fall holiday season, or the major holiday season of any other religious minority, in a substantial way.

Citizens from religious minorities should not have to choose between being fully involved in an election campaign and observing their major holiday season. We urge the government to make the requested legislative change, so that the multicultural accommodation that they have so generously sought to achieve is fully actualized.

The recent Climate Change Symposium held in Halifax ("Synagogue symposium examines climate change," CJN, Feb. 8) was a welcome step in alerting us to the dangers of global warming. All of us need to confront what we are doing to the planet. Prime Minister Stephen Harper now calls climate change "the challenge of our time."

But there's another major issue looming – one most Canadians seem little concerned about, that is certainly more serious in the immediate future: a nuclear exchange between Iran and Israel, which could lay waste much of the Middle East and draw many other countries into a larger war. The nuclear radiation and fallout that would envelop the earth would, I submit, be a most horrific form of global warming.

Carter more influential than Aloni

Former education minister Shulamit Aloni is not the only Israeli who believes that former U.S. president Jimmy Carter's description of Israeli actions beyond the Green Line (Israel's border before the Six Day War) in his book Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid, treats Israel with kid's gloves ("Memo to a useful idiot," CJN, Feb. 1).

Those who object to Israel's actions in the occupied territories do not need a 78-year old, long-retired politician to support their claims. With all due regards to Aloni, Carter has a far greater influence on public opinion and on the decision-making process in the world. The digital revolution has changed the way people access information: the 70,000 hits generated after Googling "Shulamit Aloni" and "apartheid" are quite insignificant compared to the 796,000 hits for "Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid" and 1,380,000 for "Jimmy Carter."

In Ha'aretz, Eliahu Salpeter wrote that "were it not for their [U.S. Jewish organizations'] attacks, it is doubtful [Carter's] book would have soared to the top of the bestseller list." Salpeter also wrote that "Carter's book does not reveal anything new to the average Israeli or American interested in the Middle East."

Aloni couldn't even come close to the damage done to Israel and to Jews all over the world by those caring Jews and concerned Jewish organizations. Carter's credibility is hard to shake, and Salpeter concludes that "the best thing from Israel's perspective would have been for the American media to ignore the book."

Acknowledging God's gifts

The gift of gratitude, which Judy Siblin-Librach wrote about in her column "Appreciating what you have" (CJN, Feb.8), was taught to the Jewish people thousands of years ago. This attitude of gratitude is especially emphasized in our morning prayers in Birkot Hashachar, the Blessings of the Dawn. Every morning, we thank God for the gifts of life, of sight, movement, the clothes that we have, the solid ground that we stand on and many other things. We even acknowledge, with amazement, the ability of the rooster to distinguish between day and night when we, looking outside, see darkness and think that it's still night. We begin each day with thankfulness, and we continue this way, for we are taught that we should acknowledge God's gifts 100 times each day. Beginning each day with thankfulness, as the rabbis taught, changes the whole way that we live.

Perspectives

Mobilize now, save the world

By NATAN SHARANSKY

Just over three years ago, at the first-ever global forum on anti-Semitism organized by the State of Israel, the essential task was to define the beast – the new anti-Semitism. Since then, as the fourth such global gathering meets this week, efforts to incorporate the "three-D" distinction between legitimate criticism of Israel and the new anti-Semitism – demonization, double standards and delegitimization – have become part of international documents and discourse.

These and other accomplishments, as important as they are, have been dwarfed by the quantum leap anti-Semitism itself has taken. It has leapfrogged from isolated attacks against Jews to incitement to genocide – the actual elimination of the Jewish state.

This shift has come in the form of a pincer movement. On one side, we have the Iranian regime, which is denying the Holocaust and calling for Israel to be "wiped off the map" while racing to develop the physical means of doing this. On the other side, we have what is, in effect, international silence in response, coupled with growing willingness to discuss Israel's existence as a mistake, an anachronism or a provocation.

We must recognize the fact that though sympathy for Iran's expressed goal of destroying Israel is hardly mainstream, the idea of a world without Israel is more acceptable in polite company, the media and academia today than Hitler's expressed goal of a Europe without Jews was in 1939.

Given this situation, it should be clear that we are beyond the stage of definitions. The Jewish world must now mobilize at a level at least equal to that achieved during the struggles to establish the State of Israel and to free Soviet Jewry. It is this latter struggle that presents the most potent model for action today.

Though both sides of the genocidal pincer are in quite advanced stages of development, the Jewish world remains mired in pre-mobilization debates reminiscent of the early stages of the Soviet Jewry struggle in the 1960s. This may be hard to recall in light of the subsequent success, but back then, a debate raged among Jews over whether a campaign to free Soviet Jewry was "too parochial," and whether being out front risked making it too much of a "Jewish issue."

Before these internal debates were resolved, the Soviet Jewry effort could not be regarded as a movement, capable of attracting allies and moving governments. Nor were such debates easily, or ever fully, put to rest. As late as 1987, when the by then mature and powerful movement organized the largest-ever Soviet Jewry rally on the Washington Mall to coincide with Mikhail Gorbachev's visit, some Jewish leaders wondered if the community could be mobilized and if such a rally would be counterproductive. They warned that only a few thousand souls would brave the winter weather and that the Jewish community would be considered "warmongers" who were spoiling the recent warming of U.S.-Soviet relations.

In actuality, more than 250,000 people came to a rally that was pivotal in opening the floodgates, not just to 10,000 or 20,000 Jews, which seemed like a dream at the time, but to a million Jews who came to Israel over the following decade.

Since it has been awhile, a reminder is in order of what full mobilization looks like.

First, as Shlomo Avineri has recently proposed (see The CJN editorial of Feb. 8), Iranian officials should get the Soviet treatment. Just as no Soviet official, including sports and cultural delegations, could travel without being accosted by protests and hostile questions, so it should be with anyone representing the Iranian regime. As in the Soviet case, such protests will not themselves change Iranian behaviour, but they are critical to creating a climate that will influence the policies of western governments.

Natan Sharansky

Second, an inventory of the governments and companies that provide Iran with refined oil, huge trade deals, and even military and nuclear assistance should be taken and public pressure be put on them to end their complicity with a regime that is racing to genocide.

Third, the pension funds of U.S. states should be divested from all companies that trade with or invest in Iran. This divestment campaign must be pursued without apologies or hesitation.

Fourth, every country that is party to the Genocide Convention (the UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, which took effect in January 1951) should be called upon.to fulfil its obligation under that treaty and seek an indictment of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on the charge of incitement to genocide, which is a "punishable offence" under Article III of that treaty.

Fifth, human rights groups, such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch, which are heavily nourished by Jewish values, passion and funding, must stop squeezing both sides of the genocidal pincer. These groups must be challenged, on the one hand, to press for enforcement of the Genocide Treaty, to stand up for human rights in Iran and to oppose and expose Iranian support for terrorism. On the other, they must stop perverting the sacred cause of human rights into a cudgel in Iran's hands against Israel. This happened just a few months ago when, during the Lebanon war, such groups all but ignored Hezbollah's terrorism from behind human shields and called Israel's self-defence a "war crime."

Just as the two sides of the pincer themselves are connected, so too must be the efforts to combat them. All the above steps concern the Iranian side of the pincer. But combating the other side, the denial of Israel's right to exist, is no less critical – and more difficult, since at times it necessitates confronting, not a rogue regime, but our own cherished institutions. On this front:

First, universities that provide chairs for professors who campaign against Israel's right to exist should be boycotted. In a number of countries, denying the Holocaust is a criminal act. In the current context, denying Israel's right to exist lays the groundwork for a second holocaust even more directly than denying history does. Therefore, the promulgation of such an ideology should be fought even by societies that justifiably revere freedom of speech.

This may seem a hopelessly difficult task, but it is not. After 9/11, one woman, a student, took on Harvard University, which was ready to accept a $10-million "gift" from a Saudi sheikh. Harvard backed down, showing that moral clarity, unapologetically and passionately expressed, can change seemingly unassailable ideas.

We must stand for a basic principle: if denying the Holocaust can land a professor in jail, denying Israel should not land him tenure.

Second, support for Israel must be demonstrated. Two decades after the massive Soviet Jewry rally of 1987, we need to return to the Mall on Israel's Independence Day in May with two messages: support Israel and stop Iran. It is late, but not too late, to overcome those fears of being "too parochial" that the Soviet Jewry movement succeeded in dispelling more than 30 years ago.

The fight to support Israel and stop Iran now is, if anything, less "parochial" than the Soviet Jewry movement was then. Then, the Jewish world took on a global superpower, the Soviet Union, and confronted the reigning American foreign policy paradigm – detente – with a very different one: linkage of trade to human rights.

Then, we successfully argued that the freedom to emigrate was not just a Jewish concern, but a universal one, and we were more right than we knew. The Jackson-Vanik amendment – part of the 1974 U.S. Trade Act, which denied normal trade relations with certain countries, and the Helsinki Accords agreed upon at the 1975 Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe were critical factors in triggering the internal collapse of the Soviet empire. This collapse freed not only millions of Jews, but all the peoples behind the Iron Curtain, and ended a half-century-old superpower stalemate that threatened the entire planet.

Now the world stands at a no less fateful watershed. The world's most dangerous rogue regime is on the verge of obtaining the ultimate weapons of terror. Already, Iran's confidence that it will not be stopped has led to one war, last summer's war in Lebanon started by Hezbollah. Already, Iran is fuelling conflicts in Iraq, Afghanistan, Lebanon and Gaza – and all this before the regime enjoys its own full, declared nuclear umbrella.

The moment before mobilization is always a lonely one in which it seems that the obstacles to making a cause universal are insurmountable. Yet, as in the case of the Soviet Jewry movement, we are not alone. We are surrounded by potential allies who may not themselves know they are ready to join us until we create a movement for them to join.

Our leadership will give others the opportunity to act. If the Jewish world does not lead the way, who will? It is as true now as it was then: if we build it, they will come.

A decade after the wave of democracy that came with the fall of the Soviet Union, an Iranian-led wave of terror is rising that will not stop until it is stopped. Ultimately, we overcame our fear of parochialism to stand up for Soviet Jewry, and left the world a much better place for it. Now we must do the same to prevent a second holocaust, and in the process, save the world.

Opinions

Cause for celebration

Some three years after the end of the British Mandate and the establishment of the State of Israel, an official in the British Embassy in Tel Aviv reported to the Foreign Office in London that in the near future, Israel would become a one-party dictatorship.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

He had valid reasons for his analysis: Israel was surrounded by very hostile neighbours and in need of strong leadership to protect itself; it had a population coming largely from countries with no democratic tradition (specifically, eastern Europe and Arab lands); it had a powerful army; and it had a charismatic, autocratic leader (David Ben-Gurion). Other than India, all the post-British Empire states became one-party dictatorships.

But not Israel. Alex Yakobson of Hebrew University argues that Israel has become a more robust democracy over time. For example, when Likud came to power in 1977, some people assumed the Mapai party, which had dominated the state since its inception, would not yield. It did. Then it was feared that prime minister Menachem Begin and his right-wing supporters would abolish liberal democracy. They did not.

Even the many attempts on the part of anti-democratic forces within Orthodoxy to impose themselves on the country have largely failed. The situation may not be perfect, but it's improving all the time.

The internal party system has also become much more democratic. Unlike in previous years, small cliques within each party no longer decide who will be high enough on party lists to be elected. Today, the major parties have primaries and the competition to get well-placed is fierce – but democratic. An unfortunate side effect of this, however, is corruption. In the old days, there was nobody to bribe to vote for you. Today, candidates can, and sometimes do, bribe people – just as in other democracies.

Things are, therefore, by no stretch of the imagination as bad as "post-Zionist" critics in Israel and abroad often make them out to be, even if, alas, the situation is not always as good as passionate advocates maintain. On balance, however, there is infinitely more right with Israel than wrong.

Contrary to earlier predictions and current criticisms, Israel is a resounding success. It still has many internal burdens. It has not solved "the Jewish problem," for there is still anti-Semitism in the world. And it has not yet been able to sufficiently galvanize the Jewish people worldwide, but even here progress is palpable. Jewish life without Israel has become almost unimaginable.

Within the next few years, the majority of the world's Jews will live in the Jewish state. Most of those who won't will continue to be linked to it emotionally, spiritually and often even culturally. It is a cause for unalloyed celebration.

Me and Peter MacKay

Waking up in a post-party stupor, I stumbled downstairs this morning to find bottles and garbage scattered around the house after last night's good times.

Despite impending mid-terms and other stress-inducing realities of school, friends and acquaintances alike descended upon festivities at my house last night with little regard for the next day's workload.

Jonah Brotman in Ottawa

Along with the typical party supplies, most people arrived with opinions and a willingness to debate. Hot-button issues such as Darfur, global warming and tuition fees naturally became conversation starters.

Not surprisingly, the subject of Israel also popped up rather quickly.

Whether I'm among people in the "apartheid state" camp or the apathetic majority who just hear the word Israel and stare blankly, I often find myself in the position of wanting to be self-critical but also firmly wanting to defend the Jewish homeland.

I used to love to argue with anyone who was willing to listen about the 1917 Balfour Declaration or 1947's UN Partition Plan. Tracking facts and stats about Israel used to be a sort of intellectual sport.

Now, however, I often find that the debate is stuck between ideological extremes.

My educational career has traversed many terrains, from the sheltered confines of Hebrew day school to an affluent (and mostly white) public high school to an Arab-dominated university campus. So I can safely say I have encountered all the perspectives that are out there when it comes to Israel.

For many Canadians, and especially the ones who stare blankly, Israel is a blazing coal that's too hot to touch, although negative media portrayals have shown Israeli aggression juxtaposed with Palestinian victimhood so often that most people tune out.

When it comes to the Middle East, Canada's foreign policy gurus have been bureaucratically fence-sitting for some time. Canada has cleverly navigated the diplomatic waters by raising the flags of human rights and self-determination with the same hand. As such, Canadian policy has been politically correct, yet often lacking in substance.

Recently, though, Prime Minister Stephen Harper's Conservative government has broken the mould of Canadian foreign policy and undeniably sided with Israel. Joining the international boycott against Hamas, Canada has worked hard to establish itself as a friend of Israel.

And while Harper's recent rhetoric at the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy's dinner undeniably scratched the crowd's ideological itch with its simplistic notions of "right and wrong, not shades of grey," I am impressed by the Conservatives' commitment to the Jewish state, both in good times and in bad, such as last summer's Lebanon conflict.

I would definitely not consider myself conservative, big C or little, and some might find it even comical that I would support anything that's Tory blue. Yet my experience at university, despite its decidedly leftist tilt, has taught me to listen to people with different views.

Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay, who represents my roommate's proud Nova Scotia riding, recently visited various Arab countries, the Palestinian territories and Israel. After his visit, MacKay came to the same conclusion that I did when I toured the region: Israel's separation barrier is a justified security mechanism, but its route needs adjustment.

The main issue is about protecting Israel's citizens. The effective cessation of suicide bombers entering Israel has been directly linked to the construction of the fence. However, the fence's effect on the Palestinian population needs to be considered as well. Certain sections of it have walled in communities such as Qalqiliyah, ruining agricultural land and causing needless difficulties for the Palestinian population.

MacKay's newfound appreciation for the complexities of Israel solidifies the connection between my Canadian-ness and my Jewish-ness, and between my humanist ideals and my love for a homeland. The symbiotic growth of both of these parts of myself began long ago. My Hebrew school education gave me an understanding of Israel, my high school days showed me other opinions, and my university days… well, now I'm just confused. But there must be some talmudic saying about increased knowledge bringing confusion and new questions. Such is the endless pursuit for answers.

So where does this leave me? In the midst of a major amount of cleaning and cramming. Israel's got Harper now, but my assignments just have me.

A taste of the big leagues?

I am writing this column on the plane ride home from Atlanta, where I spent four days interviewing for the graduate program in comparative literature at Emory University. From the time that I got the invitation to come to Atlanta, I was struck, as my professors were, by how un-Canadian the whole process was.

Mordechai Wolfish in Halifax

We were all shocked to learn that the university would be flying down everyone on the department's short-list, paying not only for our plane tickets, but our hotel rooms, meals, and taxis and other frills. It was clear that the university would be flaunting its (very abundant) resources at every opportunity – not only to prove that we were now in the "big leagues," but also as a way to convince each of us that Emory should be our top choice.

Knowing about this resource-flaunting in advance, I was faced with the question of how to present myself in response to this extravagance. Would I even know how to respond, given that I only have experience with a Canadian university and its relative humility?

Among the advice I received from professors and friends before leaving on my trip was, "Don't be too Canadian!" While no one explained exactly what they meant by this, I assumed that they meant that I shouldn't play the deferent, self-effacing, responsive role that I had cultivated so well at university. It was presumed by everyone that since the university was flaunting its wares, we, the visitors, would need to flaunt our own in return.

And, indeed, this is what most of my fellow potential recruits decided to do. Dressed to the max and fitted for four straight days of (often rather banal) conversation, they decided that being loud and flashy would put them on the road to academic success. On the other hand, despite the old adage "When in Rome…" that was going through my head, I just couldn't muster this American effusiveness.

I spoke when I had something of interest to say and made it clear that, in fact, I don't know everything. Perhaps (and it's my hope that) my Canadian-ness set me apart from the others and was a welcome change for the professors. And if this cost me a spot at Emory, I'll be glad that I was rejected while being true to my Canadian self.

Something I was not expecting from this weekend was the feeling of being a commodity. The graduate students I met made it clear that the university was deciding whether or not each of us was a good investment for them – of five years, of thousands of dollars. Am I worth that much money? Probably not, given all the starving people on the streets who would benefit immensely from that money.

And yet, if a position is offered to me, I will accept it, because it will allow me to do what I want to do, and hopefully I won't be irresponsible with this "investment."

One of the fascinating parts about this weekend was the dynamic that emerged among the visitors. On the one hand, we should have looked to one another for companionship, since we were all thrown into a similar situation of uncertainty and nervousness. On the other hand, we were in competition with one another, so, in a way, being friendly seemed like consorting with the enemy.

What occurred was an outpouring of surface kindness with a clear, underlying resentment that shined forth every so often. Often, when I emerged from an interview with a professor – there were eight! – one of my peers would be waiting eagerly to hear the result.

"How did it go?" he asked.

"I think it went pretty well," I answered.

"Ohh… that's good… I mean great! I'm really happy for you!"

Indeed, the entire weekend felt like summer camp mixed with Survivor. Right before we left, e-mail addresses were exchanged, promises to keep in touch were voiced, and even a tear or two was seen streaming down the cheek of one particular recruit.

"Keep in touch, you guys! I'll miss you," she yelled after our cab.

"No you won't, who are you kidding?" I thought to myself.

And thus ended, or perhaps began, my American university experience.

The Kirshner File

Chief Justice Bora Laskin was the great dissenter

Bora Laskin, the first Jew and the first academic to be named to the Supreme Court in Canada, was a towering figure in the annals of the Canadian judiciary. Yet only now, 23 years after his death, is his career being scrutinized in a major appraisal. Philip Girard's biography, Bora Laskin: Bringing Law to Life (University of Toronto Press), is unauthorized since Laskin's family withheld co-operation. But this is a massive, thorough and thoughtful book, weighing in at 646 pages counting footnotes and an index. One might say that Girard, a professor at Dalhousie University, has made up for lost time.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The tome is leaden when Girard delves deeply into Laskin's contributions to Canadian jurisprudence. But when he examines the person per se, it flashes with the glint of humanity, and is readily accessible to the average reader. A capable biographer who writes in strong declarative sentences, Girard probes every nook and cranny of Laskin's life, from his adolescence in Fort William, Ont. – where he was born in 1912 to Russian immigrants – to his surprising elevation to chief justice in 1973.

To Girard, who clerked at the Supreme Court after Laskin succeeded Gerald Fauteux as chief justice, Laskin was a harbinger of "a new spirit of openness and transformation in Canadian society and law." Laskin sought to move Canada into a more tolerant, more just and more open epoch so that it would be receptive to "a diversity of ideas."

Frequently a dissenter, Laskin – a specialist in labour and constitutional law – brought the high court into the modern era and presided over a number of landmark cases, one of which turned on former prime minister Pierre Trudeau's attempt to unilaterally patriate the British North America Act without the consent of the 10 provinces. Laskin was an ardent advocate of federal powers, and his verdict in this case was a mirror reflection of his staunch pro-federalist views.

The book, which unfolds in chronological order, begins with the arrival of his father, Mendel (Max), to Winnipeg in 1906. Within a year or two, he sent for his wife-to-be, Bluma Zingel, and together they set off for Fort William, where the opportunities seemed better and where the nucleus of a Jewish community had already taken root.

Born on the Sabbath, Laskin was named Raphael but would be known as Bora. According to Girard, Bluma was an admirer of U.S. Senator William Borah, a pillar of the Progressive movement. Yet the name could be confusing to some. He would occasionally receive letters addressed to "Miss Cora Laskin," and when Trudeau appointed him chief justice, an Israeli newspaper correspondent referred to him as "Dora Laskin."

As a high school student, Laskin excelled both in his studies and athletics. He decided to be a lawyer when he was 12, perhaps influenced by the lawyers who advised his father on legal matters, Girard speculates.

Laskin attended the University of Toronto and Osgoode Hall Law School. One of his teachers at the U of T was Jacob Finkelman, who was said to be its first Jewish lecturer. Their mentor-apprentice relationship morphed into a lifelong friendship. Laskin met fellow student Gertrude (Peggy) Tenenbaum in Toronto, and they were soon married.

Girard observes that Laskin's Jewish background defined him as an "outsider" in an employment market where faith and class were of paramount importance.

He managed to land an articling position with a lawyer who had an established practice in commercial and real estate law, but the pay was poor.

Thanks to a fine letter of recommendation from one of his professors, Laskin entered Harvard University on a scholarship. One of his tutors was Felix Frankfurter, a future U.S. Supreme Court justice.

Laskin acquitted himself well, graduating with a 77 average. He was offered a job in a New Deal agency in Washington, D.C., but Laskin wanted to make his mark in Canada.

Returning to Toronto in 1937, he accepted a job in a publishing house where a digest of Canadian case law was being prepared. But in the meantime, he looked high and low for work in a law firm or at a university.

A former professor recommended Laskin to the president of the University of Manitoba, but added this telling notation: "Unfortunately, he is a Jew."

Such were the temper of the times.

Yet Laskin could not be held back. In 1940, U of T hired him as a lecturer at a paltry $1,800 a year, forcing him to continue working at the publishing house. Girard adds that the university was "the only environment in which [his] primordial desire for independence, influence and security could be satisfied."

Laskin's age and marital status exempted him from call-up to the armed forces during World War II, but Girard wonders why he did not bother to volunteer.

After a stint as a labour arbitrator, Laskin was a key player in the battle, spearheaded by the Canadian Jewish Congress, to challenge racially and religiously exclusive restrictive covenants. But even as these throwbacks to an ugly past were gradually eliminated, anti-Semitism remained deeply entrenched in the legal profession, Girard notes.

His career on the bench was launched in 1965 with Laskin's appointment to the Ontario Court of Appeal. Abraham Lieff preceded him there by two years as its first Jewish judge.

Laskin's appointment to the Canadian Supreme Court, in 1970, was regarded as path-breaking. "It broke the French-English Catholic-Protestant stranglehold on the court," says Girard.

Thanks to his dissent in the Steven Truscott case and in Murdoch vs. Murdoch (a dispute over the division of matrimonial property), Laskin became the "conscience" of the court, he notes.

Against all odds, Justice Minister Otto Lang advised Trudeau to appoint Laskin rather than Ronald Martland as the next chief justice.

Martland, a conservative, had been on the court far longer than Laskin, but Lang and Trudeau wanted someone who was fairly young, proactive and likely to inject fresh ideas into the court.

As chief justice, Laskin was the great dissenter. "A judge never writes more freely than when he writes in dissent," he wrote in 1972.

"Laskin seldom wavered from the view that the overt clash of ideas was necessary to move the law forward," says Girard. "Many of his dissents, especially in administrative law, became accepted orthodoxy… while his concerns about criminal procedure were taken up in subsequent Charter jurisprudence. By contrast, Laskin's dissents in federalist cases were never adopted by his colleagues."

He describes Laskin's final year on the court as an annus horribilis due to the deterioration of his and his wife's health.

With his death on March 17, 1984, Trudeau offered the family a state funeral, but the Laskins politely declined.

Bora Laskin

Laskin's body lay in state in the Supreme Court lobby as dignitaries filed past to pay their respects, but the service took place in an Ottawa synagogue.

In summing up, Girard says that the quality of the judiciary as a whole improved markedly during Laskin's tenure. Yet Laskin had his flaws. His ideas remained impervious to change and his passionate individualism left him with less than ideal management skills. At the end of the day, however, Laskin made the law more responsive to changing expectations and values in Canada.

Parenting is a long journey, social worker says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Like every journey, says Joe Rich, parenting requires careful planning and direction.

Author of Parenting: the Long Journey, Rich, a social worker and relationship counsellor who is a regular guest on CityTV's CityLine, uses the analogy of a road trip to discuss strategies for effective parenting.

It's a long journey, "because if parents don't do a perfect job, there is lots of opportunity to improve," he said.

"The book is for parents of all ages and all types – single parents, divorced parents or parents of blended families," Rich added. "I want them to know they can always initiate changes that will improve their family life, no matter where along the parenting journey they are."

Parenting is a relationship, said Rich, it's not a job. "If [prospective] parents would read the job description, no one would apply."

The idea for the book came about, he said, after he gave a number of parenting talks at Temple Har Zion. "Rickie Glickman, principal of the pre-school, encouraged me because parents were asking about [possible] resources."

Guiding readers along their journey, Rich talks about the nine keys to phenomenal parenting, which include the parent as expert; parent in alliance, not in opposition; safety first; and communication.

He then moves on to chapters titled What to Pack and Why, Lessons for the Long Journey, including Considering other Modes of Transportation: Different Parenting Styles you can Adopt to Deal with Parenting Conundrums; and Take Your Hands off the Horn: How to Stop Yelling, What's at Stake and How to Find Support.

The final part talks about lessons for the long journey, such as Read the Map and Teach Map-Reading: Raising Your Children to Be Independent; and Ride in the Passenger Seat: Encouraging Co-operation, Mutual Respect and Interdependence.

The conclusion assures parents that they've reached the end of the book, but not the end of the journey.

Rich said that one of parents' biggest struggles is saying "no" to children. "Kids are constantly bombarded with technology, media and marketing. It puts parents in the position of having to say 'no.'"

He devoted part of the book to the Internet, because he feels that it's an important issue.

"It should be in a central part of the home so parents can monitor their kids' usage, and parents need to become familiar with programs such as MSN and Facebook," he said.

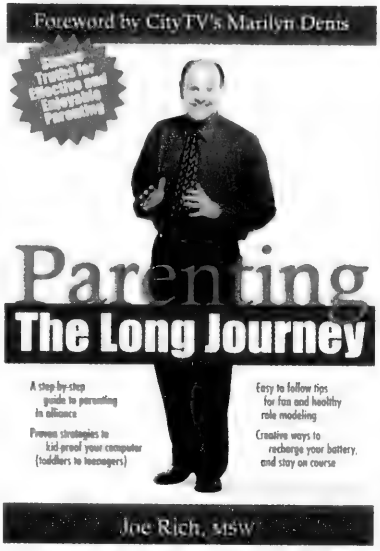
"I describe the computer as being a 'dystopia-utopia.' There are lots of negatives and lots of positives, and parents must see it as part of their children's lives."

Another big issue, he said, is whether to be your child's friend. "The answer is no. Being a friend is out. Kids are looking for parents. You should be a great mother-daughter team, not best friends."

Parents also have to know when to hold on and when to let go, Rich said.

"Up to 12 years old, you have to hold on, then you have to figure out the balance. Managing our worry is an important part of parenting. We shouldn't parent by worry. If we hold back because of fears, then we start to be irrational," he said.

"Parents should explain their fears, and then let their kids reassure them. Kids can be reassuring."



THE VARIETY I ENJOY

"It's easy to stay active and involved with so many organized outings and activities."

Every day is different, and the many opportunities for enjoyment make life more fulfilling.

With a variety of daily activities, you'll never be bored. And you'll always find an enthusiastic group to join in the fun. There's always something to look forward to.

Toronto youth feels duty to defend Jewish state

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When Mordechai Rapp set out for Israel after graduating from a Toronto Jewish high school, his intention was to spend a year studying in a yeshiva to round out his Jewish education.

It looks like his one-year plan has turned into something way bigger, perhaps even a lifetime commitment cemented by his decision to put his life on the line to defend the Jewish state.

He and two other Toronto friends decided last year to volunteer for service in the Israel Defence Forces.

Their decision was made easier by the availability of a program created in 1999 to integrate observant Jews like themselves into IDF combat units.

They enlisted in the Netzah Yehuda Battalion (Eternal Judah Battalion), better known as Nahal Haredi, an IDF unit for haredi men who serve while not compromising their religious standards. From modest beginnings – only 30 soldiers in the first year – Nahal Haredi today boasts close to 1,000 troops.

Mordechai Rapp

It is a ground infantry unit usually assigned to the Jordan Valley, where soldiers like Rapp, 20, patrol and man military checkpoints. Last summer, as the war with Hezbollah raged, his unit was deemed ready enough for assignment in the Galilee.

"We were up north during the war," Rapp said. "It was the end of our training so they put us on patrol in settlements by the Lebanese border."

Rapp was in Toronto last week, given a month-long furlough to enjoy the less than balmy winter weather back home. The one-month break along with a free ticket to get here are a couple of the benefits offered "lone soldiers," those whose parents do not live in Israel.

Describing his decision to volunteer for the IDF, Rapp said that about a year into his yeshiva education, he experienced something of an epiphany.

At yeshiva, "I learned about the religion and Israeli history and I just became attached to the land, body and soul," he said. As a student at Netivot Hatorah day school and later in high school, the importance of Israel to the Jewish people was discussed, but it didn't have the same impact as his yeshiva studies, he added.

Around the time as he was considering enlisting, several of his Israeli cousins were being drafted. That prompted Rapp to look inside himself. He felt he too had to do his part: "Don't I have a duty to my country, my people, my nation?" he asked himself.

The creation of Nahal Haredi made it easier for observant Jews like himself to enlist, he continued. Special allowances are made during basic training for daily prayer – there's no problem getting a minyan three times a day – there are no women on base, and the food adheres to the strictest standards of kashruth. Religious lectures are offered pretty well daily.

"In a regular unit, it's easy to fall, to be too tired to pray, to violate kashruth," Rapp said. Surrounded by like-minded recruits, it becomes more natural to combine military training with daily observance.

Whether the army has been successful in recruiting many haredi soldiers remains in question. Religious students in Israel can claim exemption from military service to continue yeshiva studies and news reports suggest that over 50 years, more than 50,000 have deferred military service, up from 30,000 seven years ago.

IDF's Nahal Haredi unit has sterling reputation

A story in Ha'aretz that pre-dated the 2005 Gaza withdrawal examined the percentage of soldiers in the battalion who could be considered haredi. Army spokespeople say the number could be one-third or, according to a rabbi in the battalion, as high as 60 per cent. The reporter, however, found that soldiers in the unit estimated the figure at closer to 10 to 20 per cent.

Rapp, who does not consider himself haredi, said about 15 per cent of the soldiers "in my personal draft" are haredim. Many of the others are Orthodox, though not haredi, and he classified the largest portion as "religious Zionist."

Four or five guys "expelled from Gush Katif" in Gaza serve in his unit, he said.

In addition to observant Israelis, religious Jews from around the world are joining up. "We kind of get guys from all over the map," Rapp said. He personally knows of 15 Americans and 15 French Jews in the battalion.

Once on duty outside the camp, the soldiers no longer have the luxury of avoiding contact with women or working on Shabbat. However, the halachic principle of pikuach nefesh, saving lives, takes over and so, Nahal Haredi soldiers man checkpoints on Shabbat, come into contact with women and perform other tasks they would otherwise not do.

Family's centre of gravity has shifted to Israel

According to a report in the Jerusalem Post, Nahal Haredi's early years were fraught with problems as it struggled to find recruits. At the same time, many haredi rabbis campaigned against the unit, warning it would undermine the yeshivas. There were also reports that to make up for a lack of recruits, youngsters with police records were admitted. As a result, insubordination was common.

Today, however, the unit has a sterling reputation for its work in the Jordan Valley and it has been incorporated into the IDF's new Kfir Brigade. Rapp said the soldiers are trained to act professionally. "It's a serious thing. You have to be a serious soldier."

Palestinians passing through a checkpoint – many of them going to and from work at Jordan Valley moshavim – must have their paperwork in order. "If they mess around with the rules, they'll get some consequences," he said.

His unit has arrested some Palestinians for small crimes but its biggest coup was stopping a terrorist travelling from Shechem (Nablus) to Jenin to pick up suicide belts. Alerted by army intelligence, the unit arrested before he could do harm, Rapp said.

There have been setbacks to the unit as well. One checkpoint commander was shot and killed by a terrorist at a position Rapp now mans. "So, it's not just civilians passing through, it's also terrorists," he said.

Although he's less than one year into his three-year stint, Rapp is already planning for his future. A movie buff who had been accepted to Ryerson University prior to his decision to move to Israel, he is still considering studying film at a school in Israel.

He might first return to the yeshiva to continue his religious studies while getting a job as a madrich (counselor) to help the younger students adapt to life in the Holy Land.

With his older brother, Zev, an IDF veteran now married and living in Jerusalem, and his younger brother Gershy, now studying at Lev HaTorah, Mordechai figures the family's centre of gravity has shifted to Israel. Their moves have made their parents more Zionistic. "They miss their kids. Hopefully in the future they plan on moving too," he said.

Halachah condones prisoner exchanges

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

The recent and dubious accord between Hamas and Fatah has created new hope for some sort of exchange that will return Cpl. Gilad Shalit to his family.

Through A Sephardi Window

Securing the freedom of a fellow Jew such as Shalit, held hostage by terrorists for a harrowing seven months, is a great imperative for the State of Israel. This mitzvah is called pidyon shvuyim, the ransoming of hostages, and it stands singularly above others.

While granting that the value of a single Jewish life is immeasurable, Halachah prohibits the payment of an exorbitant price in order to secure the freedom of a hostage. The logic behind this limitation is to prevent kidnappings from spiralling out of control. If it became known that Jews would consider even a ridiculous ransom demand, and raise funds at all costs, it would lead to further kidnappings.

Most famously, the Maharam, Rabbi Meir of Rotenberg, was kidnapped in Germany in the 13th century. From captivity, he issued a decree prohibiting Jewish communities from paying for his ransom. This most venerable leader of Ashkenazi Jewry remained in jail for the rest of his life, where he died.

In the case of Shalit, the government of Israel will (unfortunately not for the first time) be faced with the prospect of negotiating for a soldier's release.

The first sticky question has to do with dealing directly with the devil – that is, with the terrorists who kidnapped this young soldier. Some of the unpleasantness associated with this will be alleviated by the fact these prisoner exchanges are usually brokered through a third party.

As for the actual terms of the deal, Israel will most reluctantly resolve itself to another very lopsided exchange.

Rabbi David Yosef (the prolific author of the widely respected 24-volume Yalkut Yosef), with the consent of his father Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, has released a halachic ruling permitting the exchange of as many prisoners as needed to procure Shalit's release.

The ruling places no limits on either the number or type of prisoners that may be exchanged, including such unsavory characters as terrorists and murderers. Rabbi Yosef notes, however, that the actual decision about releasing these criminals rests entirely with the government of Israel and its defence forces, who must judge whether the release of such prisoners will compromise Israel's security. If they decide that it will not, then Halachah concurs with the unbalanced exchange.

The mitzvah pidyon shvuyim stands above others

Rabbi Yosef and his father base their ruling on the concept of saving a life, for which virtually all the mitzvot take a back seat (the exceptions being the three cardinal sins). Such is the importance with which Halachah views a single Jewish life.

Notwithstanding the traditional caution against an unbalanced ransom and the case of Rabbi Meir Rotenberg, whose life Rabbi Yosef claims was never in mortal danger, Shalit's life is most certainly is danger at the hands of his terrorist captors.

Rabbi Yosef's religious ruling, of course, carries no legal or political weight. However, it is hoped that it will be of influence to those in the Israeli cabinet who will hopefully be making such decisions soon. We continue our prayers.

A letter to MK Jamal Zahalka

Guest Voice

Dear Jamal Zahalka,
Member of Knesset,

I write to thank you for coming to Canada last week to speak at the so-called "Israeli Apartheid Week" event that was held on university campuses in Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto.

To thank you may seem odd, considering that you have aligned yourself with a series of efforts aimed at undermining the State of Israel – the very state you represent as a democratically elected member of Knesset.

As an MK since 2003, you have participated on various Knesset committees, including the science and technology committee; the public relations committee; the labour, welfare and health committee; the education, culture and sports committe; and the finance committee. In addition, you also serve as chairman of the National Democratic Assembly Parliamentary Group, a political party that holds three seats in the Knesset. I need not remind you that Arab citizens of Israel have full voting rights and constitute a significant voting block in Israel.

Ironically, by your very presence at the events associated with "Israel Apartheid Week," you disproved the vile notion that Israel is an apartheid state. Your presentation was titled, "Debunking the Myth of Israeli Democracy," yet you are the very embodiment of the rights and freedoms enjoyed in Israel's democracy.

You are living proof that Israel is not an apartheid state. Even Israelis, including elected officials who, like you, attack and criticize the State of Israel, are protected by Israel's laws, which preserve your freedom to do so. By inviting you to speak at their event, the organizers have achieved the exact opposite of their intention. Your appearance has attested to Israel's vibrant democracy and disproves the calumny that Israel is an apartheid state.

By the way, did your speech to Canadians refer to the many other Arabs who also hold high office in Israel's democracy, such as justices Abdel Rahman Zuabi and Salim Joubran, who sit on Israel's Supreme Court? Did you mention Raleb Majadele, a Labor party MK who was recently appointed a cabinet minister?

Your time on Canadian campuses could have been better spent building bridges rather than fomenting antagonism. Thankfully, most fair-minded Canadians know and understand that the State of Israel, though far from perfect, is the only democracy in the Middle East, and democracy, by definition, is inconsistent with, and abhors, apartheid.

Sincerely,

Avi Benlolo

Stumbling on Happiness by Daniel Gilbert, Random House.

Happiness is no laughing matter

Books
Bernard Baskin

What is happiness? Many and varied are the opinions. James Barrie wrote that the secret of happiness is not in doing what one likes but in liking what one has to do. Happiness, averred one cynic, is the interval between periods of unhappiness. The psalmist taught that weeping may endure for a night, but joy comes in the morning. A familiar epigram would have it that success is getting what you want, happiness is appreciating what you have.

Daniel Gilbert, the author of Stumbling on Happiness, a stimulating and often surprising book, is a professor of psychology at Harvard and an influential researcher in happiness studies.

To begin with, Gilbert maintains that happiness is a subjective and emotional state; what makes you happy may leave me cold and dissatisfied. Often we reach out for things that will make us happy, only to discover that when we get them our desire has waned or disappeared. The person you are when you imagine what it would be like to live in a large and impressive house is not the person you will be when that dream is realized.

The loss of a parent or spouse is usually sad and often tragic, and it would be perverse to suggest otherwise. But the author insists that while most bereaved people are quite sad for awhile, few become chronically depressed.

Most of us would shake our heads in disbelief when an athlete who has been through several gruelling years of chemotherapy tells us, "I wouldn't change anything." Or when quadriplegics and paraplegics tell us that they are pretty much happy as everyone else. The claims made by people who have experienced events such as these seem frankly outlandish to those of us who are merely imagining those events.

It seems the psychological immune system kicks into gear in response to big negative events, but not in response to small negative events (like your car breaking down), which means that our day-to-day happiness may be predicated more strongly on little events than on big ones. On its face, this sounds preposterous, but Gilbert cites study after study suggesting that is true.

Does more money make us happy? Economists and psychologists have spent decades studying the relation between wealth and happiness, and they have generally concluded that wealth increases human happiness when it lifts people out of abject poverty and into the middle class but that it does little to increase happiness thereafter. Americans who earn $50,000 per year are much happier than those who earn $10,000 per year, but Americans who earn $5 million per year are not much happier than those who earn $100,000 per year.

People who live in poor nations are much less happy than people who live in moderately wealthy nations, but people who live in moderately wealthy nations are not much less happy than people who live in extremely wealthy nations.

"Evidently, it hurts to be hungry, cold, sick, tired and scared, but once you've bought your way out of these burdens, the rest of your money is an increasingly useless pile of paper," Gilbert writes.

In order to achieve happiness, most of us engage in a process of self-delusion, argues the author. "How do we manage to think of ourselves as great drivers, talented lovers and brilliant chefs when the facts of our lives include a pathetic parade of dented cars, disappointed partners and deflated soufflés?

"The answer is simple: we cook the facts."

In a manner both brilliant and witty, Stumbling on Happiness shatters deeply held convictions about a highly complex and many-sided human striving. Perhaps the definitive insight on the subject is that happiness is no laughing matter.

'Other' Purim foods

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Name a traditional food associated with Purim. Good. Now name another. If you had trouble getting beyond the "H" word, then you're in for a treat. Although there's nothing wrong with that prune, poppy or chocolate-filled cookie, there are plenty of other tasty foods connected to the story of Mordechai and Esther.

Everybody knows that hamantaschen and (moderate) drinking are age-old Purim traditions. But how about enjoying turkey, kreplach, and fish cooked in vinegar, raisins and spices? You'll find explanations for these foods at the Jewish Agency website along with the reason why we use poppy seeds in our hamantaschen. Tradition has it that in order to ensure that she not eat non-kosher foods, Esther ate only seeds while in the king's palace. Thanks to Esther's piety, we get tasty filling for our Purim treats. [http://tinyurl.com/yow2rq]

Purim is unique among all the holidays in the calendar in that we enjoy the festive meal as the day is winding down, this year on the afternoon of March 4. [http://tinyurl.com/36oe2v] Rabbi Eliyahu Kitov explains that "the Purim feast is especially significant in that it elevates the soul as it provides pleasure to the body. It is thus stated in the Zohar that on Purim one may accomplish through bodily pleasure, what he can accomplish on Yom Kippur through bodily affliction." [http://tinyurl.com/36cajm]

You may have your own traditional menu but if you want to try something a bit different this Purim, why not go back to the source: Persian food. Food writer Joni Schockett recommends this exotic fare: Crusty Spicy Rice, Tangy Tangerine Chicken, Leek and Potato Pancakes and Chickpea Filling. [http://tinyurl.com/22fjy9] The large Iranian/Persian Recipes page looks appealing, but you may have to make appropriate substitutions since this isn't a kosher site. [http://tinyurl.com/3alt27]

No worries about that at Chabad.org with this gourmet menu: Pesce al Cartoccio with Spinach, Egg and Onion Salad, Cream of Chicken Soup, Pickled Tongue in Apricot Sauce and Two-Tone Potato Roll. If that feels too onerous, there's a helpful link to "The Easy Menu." [http://tinyurl.com/35oqzs]

Many of the Purim meals have placed kreplach on the menu. Why the Jewish dumpling? According to Chabad, "Hamantaschen and kreplach, both with their fillings hidden inside, allude to the hidden nature of the Purim miracle." [http://tinyurl.com/rp7gl] MyJewish Learning.com says, "Kreplach are customarily eaten whenever a 'beating' takes place: before Yom Kippur when men have flogged themselves [rarely done in modern times], on Hoshanah Rabah when willow branches are beaten, and on Purim when Haman is beaten." [http://tinyurl.com/22s5lm]

The same site points out that "among Sephardi Jews, it is a custom to wrap pastry dough around a decorated hard-boiled egg to create the shape of a Purim character or an animal. After baking, these artistic creations (folares) are displayed with pride and eaten with delight."

How to top off the meal? You could go with Linda Haim Meadows' Ba'ba Beh Tamur (Iraqi pastries with almond or date filling) [http://tinyurl.com/5d6gv] or perhaps some homemade Persian halvah. [http://tinyurl.com/2fd3ql]

After all that you may need a drink. There is the well-known – and somewhat curious – custom of getting so drunk that you don't know the difference between Mordechai and Haman. Before you reach for one too many drinks, take a look at the Neveh Zion Purim Page, which advises how much to drink: not so much that would cause you to err while performing a single mitzvah. And why we drink: "Many of the miracles in the Megillah occurred during a party where wine was drunk, therefore we are obligated to drink wine to commemorate these miracles." [http://tinyurl.com/3984vh]

On Purim, Eli Birnbaum likes to enjoy his homemade Israeli Orange Brandy, whose recipe he is good enough to share with us. And Birnbaum offers his own rationale for this tradition, "There are no absolutes in this world other than God. Everything can be used for good and evil. So, too, we celebrate our salvation from Haman by showing that even intoxication can be used to elevate one's soul." [http://tinyurl.com/2bfrcd]

History teacher has a passion for the Old West

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

There's a good chance Mark Dworkin will sport his western gear for Purim this year, as he has on occasion in the past.

A part-time teacher of history and politics at the Richmond Hill branch of the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Dworkin has a passion for the American Old West and is an expert on Wyatt Earp, of "Gunfight at the OK Corral" fame.

In 2000, Dworkin retired after more than 30 years teaching at North York public schools. The next year, he took a job teaching for a semester at CHAT and was asked to stay on. Now he is enjoying an "unexpected second phase" to his career.

His half-time hours allow him to spend more of his spare time researching, editing and writing about the Old West.

In the past decade, Dworkin – who has travelled to places such as Dodge City, Kan., Tombstone, Ariz., and Deadwood, S.D., to access their archives, libraries and newspaper morgues – has authored close to a dozen articles.

His 2005 piece in the Western Outlaw-Lawman History Association Journal on Earp's connection with the first mayor of Albuquerque, a Jewish merchant named Henry Jaffe, won the publication's 2005 award for outstanding journal article on outlaw-lawman history.

Dworkin, a married father of three grown children, traces his interest in the west back to his childhood, when "television was dominated by westerns" like Gunsmoke and Maverick, and there were many western movies.

His interest solidified in Grade 8 when he was home sick and read his entire American history textbook, because there was nothing else around. "It was fascinating," he said. "That's what got me started."

A lesson from the teacher: "History is a search for the truth as you understand the truth, and each time you read it, research it, write it, you attempt to get a little closer to the truth... In light of new evidence we have to be prepared to adjust our conclusions."

Although he went on to get a master's degree in history from the State University of New York – he grew up in Buffalo and Toronto – Dworkin didn't pursue the study of western history because "it wasn't a field anyone took seriously. It was a lot of lore… A lot of writers were putting out popular books, but they weren't very scholarly."

However, Dworkin's interest was renewed in the 1990s when that approach began to change. His own academic specialities had been 19th-century North American history and pre-Columbian history. He wrote an award-winning "quasi-textbook" on the latter subject called Mayas, Aztecs and Incas, published in 1990.

History teacher Mark Dworkin's cavalry bib-front shirt and western hat, which he wears to class on occasion "for fun," reflect his interest in the American Old West.

In recent years, Dworkin's focus has shifted to law enforcement in the American West. When discussing Earp – who was married to a Jewish woman and is buried in a Jewish cemetery – in an interview, Dworkin was quick to note his Jewish connection.

In the classroom, Dworkin says he brings more in the way of "research process" ideas to his students than actual Old West content.

However, he said, "I try to devote one class a year to Wyatt Earp and his history."

Song, dance and drama have added an element of fun to some of his classes. Dworkin, who says he's always enjoyed working with teenagers, has had students sing The Wells Fargo Wagon to tie in with a lesson, and the American Civil War marching song "John Brown's Body" for another. As part of a unit on the 1920s, his class danced the Charleston, and students received bonus points for using 1920s-era slang when they saw him in the hall.

History, which is compulsory up to Grade 10, "helps us understand everything – the arts, literature," said Dworkin. "It enriches travel. It helps us understand ourselves."

Israeli soldiers experience Canadian hospitality

Mifgash participants continue Canadian tour with stop in Toronto

By REBECCA GLUCK-SOBERMAN
UJA FEDERATION

Gifts are given as a gesture of appreciation or gratitude and this is precisely what the Canada Israel Experience (CIE)'Taglit-birthright israel gift is about – to recognize every young Jewish person's potential to be a proud, identifying Jew by participating in a free, ten-day trip to Israel. Participation on the CIE Taglit birthright israel (bri) program encourages that identity.

That was the message conveyed at a UJA Federation gathering at the home of Debbie and Warren Kimel last week which featured first-hand accounts from four elite Israeli soldiers who recently participated on the CIE Taglit-birthright israel program "mifgash" (encounter). The popular program teams soldiers with bri participants. The soliders have just completed a 10-day tour of mid to eastern Canada, visiting university campuses and engaging Jewish and non-Jewish students to discuss the reality of Israel today.

Samantha Kimel (centre), a participant on birthright israel two years ago, poses with four Israeli soldiers and participants of birthright's Mifgash program, during a recent event at the Kimel home.

Since 2000, CIE Taglit-birthright israel has been offering trips to Israel for Jewish people between the ages of 18 and 26 and now boasts an alumni of nearly 15,000 Canadians, including 9,000 Torontonians. An important component of birthright isnuel is interaction between Canadians and Israelis, and in Israel that means those who are in the midst of their required army service.

For Yuval, (who, like the other soldiers have asked that their last names not be used due to security concerns), one of the four soldiers speaking at the Kimel home to an audience of nearly 50 active UJA donors, the experience in Canada completed his understanding of the birthright experience.

"I understand now what Israel means to people here," he said. "I literally saw Israeli flags in every dorm or home I visited. I don't even have one at home."

For Esy, another elite soldier, the Canadian hospitality has been heartwarming. "I am amazed how everyone welcomes us as if we are brothers."

The evening culminated with an anecdote from Tony Cohen, son of the late Andrea Bronfman, co-founder of the birthright israel program along with her husband Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt. Cohen explained the significance of birthright's longevity despite what he called "many nay-sayers" when the idea was first proposed.

"The impact it has had on both sides - Canadian and Israeli - is monumental," he said. "It has provided knowledge and unique experiences for each and every participant."

Now, in its eighth year of operation, bri is funded through a three-way partnership between the Israeli government, Jewish Federations, including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and private donors. Cohen cautioned that, in order for the gift to extend its reach – it has already been offered to 120,000 people worldwide -- it is deeply dependent on individual support.

And so the birthright israel Foundation of Canada, chaired by past UJA Federation campaign chair, Michael Bregman, is appealing to all community members for support.

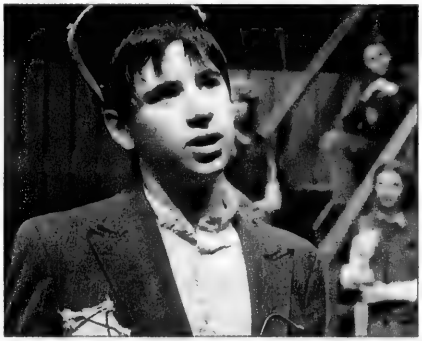
"We've become a victim of our success," Bregman said, explaining that if the program is to serve as a pivotal tool to engage the young, emerging generation of Jews, then the program must be sustained by individual supporters.

Holocaust play teaches yesterday's lessons today

By SHOSHANA POZNANSKY

With today's global resurgence in anti-Semitism, ongoing racism and acts of genocide, the messages contained in the Holocaust play, No More Raisins, No More Almonds – is still relevant.

Referring to an old Yiddish lullaby, the play, which comes to Toronto's Leah Posluns Theatre on February 27 and 28, includes 12 songs composed in World War II ghettos, sung in their original Yiddish.



A scene from the Holocaust play No More Almonds, no More Raisins, coming to Toronto on February 27 and 28.

"The minute you judge people by who they are and not by their actions, you have prejudice," said Batia Bettman, Holocaust survivor and the play's author. "Unfortunately this is still happening today."

Bettman, a child survivor in a small ghetto in Poland, conducted extensive research about ghetto songs. She found many common themes in these songs dealing with love, work, loss and children. The songs are written in the present tense and discuss the problems that the children are faced with.

"This play is important because the songs talk about real children who were in the ghetto at the time. The play is a way to bring back their memories and their stories," Betmann explained.

Seeing these memories translated on stage today is very emotional for Betmann, who cries at every performance.

Forty students from Montreal's Bialik High School make up the cast of performers, all of whom have spent countless hours rehearsing.

But, according to one of those performers, the sacrifice is well worth it.

"We know that there are atrocities in the world right now and our message is that we are not going to stand for it," said 16-year-old Daniella Berkowicz. "I think people are inspired by the fact that young adults and teenagers are part of this important play which is helping to educate a new generation about the Holocaust."

According to Bettman, one of the unique and important aspects of her play is that its message is being delivered by youth to youth by the actors who belong to Montreal's Young Actors for Young Audiences (YAYA).

"People identify with the children on stage. The play is alive, and theses performers help to put a face on the Holocaust," said Bettman, who is quick to credit director Bryna Wasserman for much of the play's success.

According to Bettman, No More Raisins, No More Almonds has been known to generate some healthy inter-generational dialogue between survivors and their grandchildren.

The post-performance dialogue sessions between the young actors on stage and the diverse audiences are open, dynamic and inspiring. During these discussions, audience members learn facts about the Holocaust and the experiences of the children participating.

Driving force behind Societies retires

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

Fahima Meranda

Making their way from the ashes of the Shoah to Toronto, few Holocaust survivors could have imagined that an Iraqi Jew who could not speak Yiddish would play an important role linking them to their roots once settled in a new land. But Fahima Meranda, who retired recently from UJA Federation, spent almost 15 of her 33 years there looking after "societies" – associations of people from the same villages in Eastern Europe, known in Yiddish as landsmannschaften.

Under Meranda's guidance, the 27 active societies became a successful campaign division of UJA Federation, taking on fundraising for projects in Israel. Most recently, Meranda led the societies effort to raise money for the Red Mountain Therapeutic Riding School, which uses horseback riding to help physically and developmentally challenged children.

"Fahima was a very important component of our fundraising efforts," says Michael Rosenberg, chair of the societies division, who worked with Meranda for close to 30 years. "She was very active in the campaign for Project Renewal, which raised money for smaller communities in Israel that needed help. Children's playgrounds and children's nurseries were focal in her work."

Meranda credits mutual respect for her success with Societies members. "I gave them respect, and they gave me respect. If they needed anything, I was there for them. I never said 'I'll call you back tomorrow.' I miss them but I am in touch with them."

"Through the years, Fahima got to know most of the societies people and formed a very warm relationship with them. For me, it was a pleasure working with her. I learned a lot from her," adds Rosenberg.

Meranda started at UJA Federation on contract in 1973, when the annual campaign began in September and continued until June "because everything was done by hand," she remembers.

But, she says, reflecting both on her early days and more recent times, "The spirit was there – that we were doing something for a good cause, for the community and for Israel," says Meranda.

More than 150 Torontonians make their way to Ottawa

CIJA Parliamentary Dinner attracts over 1,000 Jews from coast to coast

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

More than 150 members of Toronto's Jewish community joined over 1,000 Canadian Jews from Victoria to Halifax in Ottawa recently to show their support for Israel at the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) Parliamentary Dinner.

The biennial event gave Canadian Jewry access to more than 200 parliamentarians from all parties, and the chance to have a dialogue with them about urgent matters.

CIJA – supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other Canadian Jewish Federations - is a non-partisan, umbrella organization for Jewish community advocacy efforts, helping to improve the quality of Jewish life in Canada and abroad, increase support for Israel, and strengthen the Canada-Israel relationship.

"I think the parliamentary dinner had a number of impacts, each equally important," said Toronto's Michael Diamond. "For the participants, it reminds them that we are strong in numbers and in passion, and that we have many friends who care about us. For our friends and supporters, we have a chance to share a wonderful and unusual event by Canadian standards, with good people who share our beliefs and passions. And for our own community, we had the opportunity to recognize that there are so many of us who care enough to make the trip to Ottawa and show our support for our people as well as our values and our country."

The dinner, which featured speeches by Prime Minister Stephen Harper, Liberal leader Stephane Dion and NDP leader Jack Layton, was the culmination of a full day of programs in Ottawa dubbed Democracy in Action. A morning session with national media started the day, followed by a luncheon featuring guest speaker Avi Dicter, Israel's minister of public security, who formerly led Shin Bet, Israel's internal security service, and meetings with members of Parliament.

"Over the past year, we got a pretty sharp reminder that it's one thing to offer supportive words to Israel when it's convenient, and quite another to stand firm in its hour of need," said Harper. "Last summer, when Israel came under attack from terrorist groups, this government stood against those organizations and their objectives, and we stood with our friend in the democratic family of nations, the State of Israel."

"Here in Canada, when the United Talmud Torah school is attacked in my riding of St. Laurent-Cartierville in Montreal – its windows broken, its library burned – it is an attack on the values of every Canadian," said Dion. "When even one Canadian child is threatened because of her religion, we all feel the cold breath of intimidation. We can only imagine the insecurity that Israelis feel day after day."

For Toronto's Shawna Granovsky, who made the trek to Ottawa with husband Paul and their two-month-old son, the experience was an important one.

"Obviously having the opportunity to meet with the prime minister who is so supportive of Israel, was wonderful," she said. "But to have had the chance for all of us to visit Parliament Hill and lobby so many of our Members of Parliament – en masse – was incredible. I spent over an hour with Dr. Carolyn Bennett discussing important matters to the Jewish community. With the knowledge and tools given to us by CIJA, I really think we had an impact on how Canada's leaders will think regarding matters important to our Jewish community."

Share your Passover with Cuban Jews

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

It is now easier than ever for community members to contribute to "Pesach in Cuba," the annual effort by Canadian Jewish Congress Charities Committee – Ontario (CJC Charities) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to provide Cuba's 1,500 Jews with kosher-for-Passover food.

CJC Ontario Region sent Passover provisions – including wine, matzah, matzah meal, gefilte fish, horseradish, tea, cooking oil, and consommé – to Cuban Jewry from 1961 to 2005, a project whose importance cannot be underestimated, says Steven Shulman, Ontario regional director and national general counsel for CJC Charities.

"What we do as a community here in Ontario is to make a true Pesach possible for Cuban Jewry," says Shulman.

Only last year, however, through a partnership with UJA Federation, did CJC Charities begin to utilize electronic means to raise the $30,000 necessary to buy and ship all the food. And this new medium is now allowing an old relationship with local synagogues to once again flourish.

Past joint initiatives to raise community awareness and funds for Pesach in Cuba were suspended when "the fundraising cost became prohibitive," says Shulman. "We used to do it through the mail system and the cost of postage ended up becoming inefficient."

"With the new electronic fundraising system, however, we can make available to synagogues and other organizations links to Federation's website and to the electronic appeal," Shulman explains. "We're asking synagogues to partner with us by sending out e-blasts to their membership and including links and buttons on their websites that can provide all the information to their congregants. We are also gratified by the commitment of Canada-Israel Experience Taglit – birthright israel alumni to participate in this appeal."

"We have a tradition of Maot Chittin- providing assistance to Jews in need to meet Pesach's unique requirements," says Jeff Springer, campaign director for UJA Federation. "Pesach in Cuba exemplifies that tradition."

Adela Dworin, president of Casa de la Comunidad Hebrea de Cuba, describes the significance of the program to the Cuban Jewish community. "Ninety per cent of the Jews left in the sixties and seventies, and it is harder to keep a smaller community strong. But when Passover foodstuff comes to Cuba and we deliver them to the Jewish families, at least they know that they are Jews. At least there is a box of matzah on the table."

Through programs such as Pesach in Cuba and UJA Federation-sponsored missions to Cuba, Ontario Jewry maintains close ties to Cuban Jewry, a relationship that strengthens both communities. "Seeing the Jews of Cuba maintain Jewish holidays and traditions without the conveniences and communal structure that we take for granted, reminds us why our work here is so important," says Springer.

As for the Cuban side of the equation, Dworin says, "We are very thankful to the Canadians because they keep the flame of Judaism alive in Cuba. They are doing a wonderful mitzvah."

Jewish campus groups respond to Israeli Apartheid Week

By ALINA OLSHENITSKY
Special to The CJN

Despite the stormy conditions last week, the lecture hall at University of Toronto's University College filled with students who came to hear Israeli Ambassador to Canada Alan Baker speak about "The Reality of Zionism on Campus."

The lecture was organized by Hillel of Greater Toronto Feb. 14, in response to "Israeli Apartheid Week 2007," which took place Feb. 12 to 17 on campuses throughout North America and Europe.

Baker began his lecture by debunking allegations made by the organizers and presenters during Israeli Apartheid Week.

He said he made aliyah 40 years ago with a genuine belief that Zionism would bring a national liberation to the Jewish people. At the same time, however, he spent 20 years of his life in peace negotiations with surrounding countries – Jordan, Egypt and Lebanon – as well as with the Palestinians.

"I am a Zionist and I want peace," he said.

"People who call Israel an apartheid state are a small group of extremists, bent on a very particular political agenda: [they] are trying to hijack the minds of the student body to conform to their extreme agenda."

The process of a large group being manipulated by a small group is becoming a "global trend," Baker said, and in Canada, events such as Israeli Apartheid Week abuse the very core of the system of Canadian openness.

Calling Israel an apartheid state is "a celebration of ignorance, a hypocrisy, academic dishonesty and crude propaganda," he said.

"The main problem is that people use the word 'apartheid' arbitrarily without knowing its real meaning. Apartheid is state-sanctioned and racial degradation of coloured people, an inherent assumption of inequality and racial inferiority leading to racial segregation. It is the denial of basic social, civil, political and economic human rights. This is not what Israel means."

To make his point clear, Baker quoted Israel's Declaration of Independence, which states that "the State of Israel... will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants irrespective of religion, race or sex; it will guarantee freedom of religion, conscience, language, education and culture..."

From left, Israeli soldiers Yuval Gonczarowski, Shira Yanai, Gal Fontyn and Esi Baitelman answer questions at U of T about life in Israel.

To emphasize this point, Baker highlighted several facts about Israel: it has two official languages – Hebrew and Arabic. The voice of Arab citizens is expressed daily in the media through different television channels, radio stations and newspapers. Currently there are three Arabic political parties in the Knesset as well as one Arabic judge in the Supreme Court. Finally, one-third of the staff at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem is Arabic, and patients come from Jordan for treatment on a regular basis.

In his final remarks, Baker mentioned Jamal Zahalka, an Arabic member of Knesset who spoke in Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal on "Debunking the Myth of Israeli Democracy," in support of Israeli Apartheid Week.

"[Zahalka is] a living example of Israeli democracy," Baker said. "Mr. Zahalka is a member of the Israeli Knesset who has benefited from all the democratic and social tenets of Israeli society. He has been a member of numerous parliamentary assemblies, lobbies and committees. Now he goes overseas to openly criticize Israel with the support of Israeli taxpayers' money. Would a Jew enjoy such freedom in any Arab or Muslim country?"

Tilly Shames, Hillel's associate director, said at the close of the event that the purpose of Baker's talk was to "deliver a positive Israel message during a difficult time on campus for Jewish and Zionist students. The lecture debunked the myth of any apartheid practices in Israel and hopefully equipped students with the right tools to respond to false allegations against Israel on campus."

Days before the lecture, Shames said Hillel students would also be handing out brochures titled Don't accept the apartheid lie, in the same space where other campus groups had tables set up for Israeli Apartheid Week.

"The intention there is not to confront those who are responsible for Israeli Apartheid Week, but rather to reach out to the larger population on campus who are exposed to the apartheid lie on campus and to share with them a different perspective," Shames said.

She said Hillel's efforts were intended to bring together Zionist students, Jewish students and pro-Israel students on campus to gather their energy to do something positive, as opposed to being faced with the negativity on campus.

The day before Baker's lecture, a chapter of the Zionist group Betar-Tagar at U of T also organized an event in response to Israeli Apartheid Week.

"Israelis on Israel: A Q & A With Israeli Soldiers" gave students an opportunity to speak with Israeli soldiers about living in Israel and serving in the army.

First Lieut. Yuval Gonczarowski, an officer in the intelligence corps; 1st Lieut. Esi Baitelman, an Air Force fighter pilot; 2nd Lieut. Gal Fontyn, a naval missile boat commander; and 2nd Lieut. Shira Yanai of the artillery corps academy participated in the hour-long event.

Anti-Israel efforts spread to more campuses

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

This is one of the many signs that littered the University of Toronto campus during Israeli Apartheid Week. [Tori Cheifetz photo]

Universities across Canada, Europe and the United States hosted the third "Israeli Apartheid Week," a series of lectures on the topic "Zionist ethnic cleansing, colonization and occupation of Palestine."

The organizers of the event Feb. 12 to 17, including the Arab Students' Collective, Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights and the Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid – which is not a campus group – held lectures at universities in Toronto, Hamilton, Ottawa, Montreal, New York, Oxford, Cambridge and London.

On a website that promoted the week-long event, the organizers accused Israel, Canada and the United States of "tightening the strangulation hold on the Palestinian people in an attempt to provoke Palestinian infighting... while the Israeli military continues its brutal daily assault on Palestinian life."

Ben Feferman, the Canadian campus co-ordinator for Hasbara Fellowships, attended a lecture titled "Apartheid: Turtle Island, South Africa, Palestine."

He said he was there to take some pictures and a video that he could show to students who want to learn to be pro-Israel activists.

Feferman said he's putting together a mini-documentary about the new trend of anti-Israel propaganda on campus.

What was interesting about the event, he said, was that the Israeli Apartheid Week organizers adopted a strategy that Israel advocacy groups use.

"In order to convince people to be pro-Israel, you have to find a shared value. For instance, Canada is a democracy and Israel is a democracy, so we have that shared value. What is an interesting trend now, is that they are doing the same thing," Feferman said.

"They had one speaker talking about the native apartheid... one person talked about South Africa and one person talked about the Palestinians," he said, adding that the anti-Israel groups are attempting to use apartheid as a shared value.

"They are also stepping up the language, saying that Israel is ethnically cleansing the West Bank and Gaza. The community and students need a wake-up call that there is a big assault on Israel."

Other lectures throughout the week that bore controversial titles included "The Ethnic Cleansing of Palestine" and "Ideologies of genocide and apartheid."

Ironically, Jamal Zahalka, a Palestinian member of Knesset travelled to Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa to present his lecture titled "Debunking the Myth of Israeli Democracy."

Norman Finkelstein, author of The Holocaust Industry, was also scheduled to speak at McMaster University in Hamilton.

Shaun Hoffman, Hillel's Israel affairs chair at University of Toronto said the university's administration decided for the third year that it wouldn't cancel the event.

"They decided they will not take any meaningful action on any event that doesn't violate the Criminal Code of Canada, and within the Criminal Code of Canada, things like hate speech are very narrowly defined."

Last year, when Hillel was in talks with the administration to force the organizers to drop the word "apartheid" from the event's title, Jim Delaney, U of T's assistant director of student affairs told The CJN that "the university will not attempt to censor, control or interfere with any group on the basis of its philosophy, beliefs, interests or opinions expressed, unless and until these lead to activities which are illegal or which infringe the rights of others. Accordingly, there are no grounds for censoring the use of the word 'apartheid.'"

Tilly Shames, Hillel's associate director, said that although the administration decided the event doesn't incite hatred, "they do recognize that using inflammatory labels is not conducive to civil discourse on campus and is not helpful in creating community on campus."

"I've spoken to a couple people already who have called me frustrated because the administration won't take action," Hoffman said. "Ultimately we're very disappointed that this event and any event like this continues to occur on campus because it doesn't encourage dialogue, it doesn't encourage discourse, it simply encourages hate, and it tries to single out Israel and delegitimize Israel."

Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) for Holocaust Studies wrote a letter to U of T president David Naylor in which he called on him to cancel the event.

"We call on the university's administration to disallow this from taking place, and we encourage you to [have] great concern over the radicalization of the university," Benlolo wrote in the letter.

A University of Toronto student sits under a Mohawk warrior flag and a Palestinian flag during Israeli Apartheid Week. [Tori Cheifetz photo]

Although Israeli Apartheid Week was given the green light from U of T, as well as schools in seven other cities, Benlolo said, "we will continue to demand action against the targeting of Israel and our community and FSWC will continue to interface with the University of Toronto on this critical matter."

Hoffman said that despite his disappointment that this event is allowed to go on, he isn't worried.

"I firmly believe that the message is not legitimate, the points being made are not legitimate… Eventually, the fact that there is nothing but hate and the desire to incite hate that drives events like this, eventually those motives will be exposed and the vocabulary used will be delegitimized."

The Lives of Others

הסרט יוקרן ב22 בפברואר ב 8 בערב, ב

Vaughn City Playhouse, 1000 New Westminster Dr, Thornhill

ART AND MUSIC LOVERS

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Coverage of Mecca accord connects the dots

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Most major Canadian media outlets covered the Feb. 9 "Mecca accord" – the Saudi Arabia-brokered PA government "unity" agreement between Hamas and Fatah – in a fair and accurate manner.

Analyzing developments from Jerusalem for the National Post ("New Palestinian Cabinet appealing to the West: But Hamas still refuses to accept Israel's right to exist," Feb. 12) Matthew Fisher wrote that the new unity government "creates a dilemma for Israel."

On the one hand, Fisher noted, the Israeli government can't recognize a new Palestinian government that includes Hamas, which still refuses to recognize the Jewish state and renounce terrorism. On the other hand, Israel does not want to be seen as rejecting any movement toward change within Palestinian governance now that Fatah is supposed to share power in a new PA.

Thus, just days before Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was scheduled to meet with Palestinian Authority president Mahmoud Abbas and U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in a tripartite summit, Israel adopted a "wait and see" approach, neither accepting nor rejecting the proposed new government.

Still, Israel urged the EU and Russia (members of the "Quartet" of nations that back the moribund "road map" peace plan) to stick to their three conditions for resuming financial aid to the PA: recognition of Israel's right to exist, renunciation of violence and acceptance of previous PLO-Israel agreements.

Fisher explained that under Saudi auspices, Abbas failed even "to convince Hamas to agree that the new [PA] government would 'abide' by previous agreements Fatah had reached with Israel… What [he] got was the word 'respect,' which was intentionally ambiguous and has already been interpreted in many different ways by Arab and Israeli analysts."

In its Feb. 12 editorial, "Boost Palestinian aid," the Toronto Star chose its words very carefully. It called the Mecca agreement a "qualified success, resulting in a Palestinian Authority with a more moderate hue." The paper urged Prime Minister Stephen Harper to strengthen Abbas by channelling financial aid to the Palestinian people through "United Nations-approved channels" instead of directly to the PA.

However, the Star went on to argue, the Palestinians made a "tragic mistake" last year by rejecting Fatah and electing Hamas, a "party [that] seeks Israel's destruction." As for the proposed power-sharing arrangement of the new PA government, the Star raised a cautionary note: "How moderate this 'national unity' government will be remains to be seen. Understandably, Israelis are deeply skeptical."

The paper argued that Hamas' promise to "respect" past agreements "comes nowhere close" to meeting Quartet conditions for resuming diplomatic and financial support to the PA. Therefore, the Star wrote: "Until Palestinians democratically remove Hamas from power, or Hamas itself undergoes a conversion, Canada will be under no obligation to support the [new PA] government."

As in the Star editorial, the Post's Fisher observed that one of the principal motivations behind the Mecca accord was to stop the internecine fighting that resulted over the past weeks in scores of Palestinians being killed, including children.

One of the principal motivations was to stop the internecine fighting

Fisher wrote: "Every Palestinian has been left wondering why it was that the leaders of Hamas and Fatah could reach an agreement on sitting together in government in Mecca and seal the deal by kissing each other in public while their armed wings were still trying to kill and kidnap each other as recently as [Feb. 6]." And he warned that the "bloodletting might not be over yet."

Fisher also drew attention to a broader regional factor motivating the Mecca agreement – Saudi Arabia's fear (shared by other Sunni-dominated Arab governments) of Iran's growing influence in the Middle East, including its support for Hamas and Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Fisher even raised the possibility that "the United States may be susceptible to Saudi pressure to soften its position on the new Palestinian administration in return for Saudi support against Iran."

It is, arguably, this broader regional dynamic that holds the key to understanding these recent changes.

Cholov Yisroel hard cheese now being made in Canada

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canadian-made cholov Yisroel hard cheese will soon be appearing in kosher food stores across the country for the first time in recent history.

This type of cheese, which is made under the most rigorous kashrut supervision, has been available here for many years only in the form of imports, mainly from the United States and Israel.

The Montreal-headquartered Eldorado Dairy Company Ltd. has received rare permission from the Canadian Dairy Commission for an annual quota of milk to produce a wide variety of ripened cheeses at its plant near Belleville, Ont. The company is under the supervision of Montreal's Vaad Ha'ir and the cheese will bear the MK hechsher.

The Canadian dairy industry is tightly regulated and, in Ontario, it's virtually impossible for a new cheese company to obtain a milk quota, unless it can show it will fill a niche not met by any other Canadian business. (The amount of milk produced in the province is set by the Dairy Farmers of Ontario.)

Eldorado, whose president is Michael Rosenberg, was accepted under the Dairy Commission's Domestic Dairy Products Innovation Program, designed to encourage Canadian production and reduce reliance on imports.

With the start of domestic production, imported cholov Yisroel hard cheese will likely begin disappearing in Canada.

Laval Letourneau, chair of the program's selection committee, said Eldorado asked for and was granted three to five million litres of milk per year, which will enable it to produce 300 to 500 tons of cheese. This amount could be increased in time if the demand is there, said Letourneau, who is also chief of commercial operations for the commission, a Crown corporation that co-ordinates federal and provincial dairy policies.

The first Eldorado products, under the brand name Golden Cheese, are expected to be on the market by the end of March. Another one or two labels are to be announced in the coming months, Rosenberg said, possibly one for the Muslim halal market.

Rosenberg bought and updated the Eldorado Cheese Factory, in the hamlet of Eldorado in Madoc Township. The formerly non-kosher plant, founded in 1951, has been closed for eight years.

Rosenberg has retained one of its award-winning cheesemakers, who has almost 20 years of experience in cheese-making and running two plants. Rosenberg himself is a newcomer to the food industry. He has worked in the distribution of electronic goods in recent years. He will be co-ordinating the company's day-to-day business administration and sales from Montreal.

Rosenberg said the plant has the capacity to process just over five million litres of milk annually, and to produce approximately 530,000 kilograms of hard cheese. "We have the ability to scale this up to 10 million litres as the company grows," he said.

He estimates that his potential market is 800,000 kilograms per year, assuming that 25 per cent of Canada's approximately 400,000 Jews keep kosher.

"The average Canadian eats 12 kilograms of cheese a year. I would think Jews eat somewhat less because of not mixing meat and dairy, so I put it at 8 kilograms a year."

Among the products Eldorado will be making are various kinds of cheddar and mozzarella, cheese curds, emmenthal, edam, colby, Monterey Jack, muenster, provolone, havarti, Swiss, gouda and farmers, as well as fresh cheeses like cottage, ricotta and feta, in a wide variety of formats, such as blocks, sliced and shredded, and in weights up to 40 lbs. for the food-service industry.

Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance
The agony of agunot

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

With strident calls for action and threats of "taking to the streets" if the issue is not soon resolved, participants in the 10th anniversary conference of the Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance ratcheted up the rhetoric around the plight of agunot, "chained women" whose husbands refuse to grant them a religious bill of divorce.

Tova Hartman

"Let this be the last JOFA conference where we need to ask if there's a halachic heter [permissive legal ruling] for agunot," Tova Hartman, founder of an Orthodox feminist synagogue in Jerusalem, told the approximately 1,000 people, mostly women, who attended Sunday's conference in New York City.

"The time has come to stop kvetching."

The rhetoric on agunot contrasted sharply from that on other topics at the conference, where a sense of confidence bordering on the triumphant prevailed, owing to the substantial progress made in the decade since JOFA's founding.

Women today serve as congregational heads, spiritual leaders and advisers on matters of religious law. They have greater access to textual study that once was the domain of men. And their participation in public prayer is on the rise with the growth of so-called "partnership minyanim" in which women take on some leadership roles – including reading the Torah and leading certain prayers – in an otherwise typical Orthodox service.

Other issues, like marking a girl's bat mitzvah, have fallen off the agenda entirely now that such celebrations are par for the course in Orthodox congregations.

"It is a slow and gradual progress," JOFA executive director Robin Bodner said. "There is definitely progress. There is definitely change."

Hartman electrified the conference with her talk of civil disobedience and the creation of alternative religious courts to address the plight of agunot, who under Jewish law are forbidden to remarry until their husbands have "released" them from marriage with a get, or religious bill of divorce.

In the worst cases, husbands have refused to grant religious divorces to their wives for years, sometimes issuing the documents only in exchange for sizable ransoms.

In the United States, various rabbinic courts and civil laws provide some recourse. In New York, state law requires spouses to remove all religious barriers to remarriage before a civil divorce is granted; a similar law is under consideration in Maryland.

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin

In Israel, marriage remains under the purview of rabbinic courts that have the power to enforce their rulings. The problem, agunot advocates say, is that those powers are rarely used by judges, all of them male and drawn mostly from the ranks of the haredim.

An international rabbinic conference on the topic, the first of its kind was scheduled for last November by Israel's Sephardi chief rabbi, Shlomo Amar. It was cancelled at the last minute, however, reportedly due to pressure from Rabbi Yosef Shalom Elyashiv, an Ashkenazi rabbi widely considered the most authoritative figure in the haredi world.

"It's time that we in the modern Orthodox world challenge the power of a handful of extremist haredi rabbis," Sharon Finkel Shenhav, the only woman serving on Israel's commission to appoint religious judges, said at the conference.

Shenhav said the haredim control the courts only because "we let them."

One possible halachic solution, the so-called "tripartite" solution, would have couples sign a prenuptial agreement stipulating that the marriage is dissolved if a husband and wife voluntarily live apart for a certain amount of time.

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, the American-born chief rabbi of Efrat, Israel, argued for that option in an address to a standing-room only crowd at the convention.

While some accused the rabbinic courts of outright corruption, Riskin said the principal obstacle to resolving the issue is the courts' preoccupation with "what they think is the purity of Israel as over and against the plight of the agunah."

The tripartite solution is nearly airtight from a halachic standpoint, Riskin said, but it would only affect future marriages and would have little impact on existing agunot. Even so, he's under no illusions that the idea will be enacted.

"If it does not work, then I believe we will have no choice but to establish alternative batei din," or rabbinic courts, he said.

JOFA plans to take ads in Jewish media demanding action on agunot from the Orthodox rabbinate. The ads, which call the situation an "injustice" and a "disgrace," are timed to coincide with the Fast of Esther, which falls this year on March 1.

"If the community rose up, ultimately that's how things are changed, said Bodner. "We need to keep pushing for this change. We're going to do it. Somehow, some way."

JOFA celebrates 10th anniversary at conference

By REBECCA NADLER
Staff Writer

Ottawa resident Golda Feig, who attended her first Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance (JOFA) conference earlier this month, said being with so many halachically knowledgeable men and women discussing issues she had grappled with for years left her feeling inspired.

"It was beyond anything I could have imagined. My mind is still dancing," she said. "I don't want to impose my beliefs on anyone, [but] this conference made me feel comfortable and confident. I don't expect every rabbi to agree with me, but I now know that this is halachically legitimate."

> 'It was beyond anything I could have imagined. My mind is still dancing'
> — Golda Feig

The conference, which celebrated JOFA's 10th anniversary, began with a keynote address by Concordia professor and CJN columnist Norma Baumel Joseph, who challenged the audience of 1,200 to "to think differently," as they no longer had to "wait for permission" to try something different in their community.

Invoking the talmudic passage that Torah "is not in heaven," Joseph encouraged the participants to use Jewish law and create change in their lives and their community, change that embraces feminist sensibilities.

Among the issues discussed at the conference were new models of halachic authority that embrace the newer reality of women's increasing levels of Jewish knowledge.

Historically, there have been only a handful of women who taught Talmud to men and were consulted for legal rulings. Today, the situation is changing.

Among the presenters at the conference were numerous women who teach Talmud, and two specifically – Dina Najman, rosh kehillah (community head and spiritual leader) of Kehillat Orach Eliezer in Manhattan, and Sara Hurwitz, madrichah ruchanit (religious mentor) at Hebrew Institute of Riverdale – who fulfil the role traditionally held by male rabbis in the Orthodox community by teaching, giving sermons, officiating at shivahs and responding to halachic queries.

Blu Greenberg

A number of sessions dealt with developing meaningful prayer and services that rely on rabbinic opinions allowing women to lead those portions of the service that do not require a quorum and to read from the Torah and receive aliyot in appropriate circumstances.

Conference organizers discussed JOFA's newly created, gender-sensitive curriculum, "Bereishit: A New Beginning," which focuses on the matriarchs in the book of Genesis.

"Our goal is that beginning in third grade we hope to teach students how to read text so that it is gender inclusive and [offers] models for the young women," JOFA founder Blu Greenberg said in presenting the curriculum.

Intended to supplement, not supplant, existing day-school curricula, the new program is now being taught in a number of modern Orthodox schools in the New York area.

Organizers were committed to having the cause of agunot, women whose husband refuses to give them a Jewish divorce, front and centre at the conference, and several panels were devoted to this issue.

However, Greenberg noted that "in the past, we have had rousing sessions that left people fired up," but the problem has not been solved.

"There has been progress in 10 years," she said, "but progress is failure if we are still here 10 years later talking about the same thing."

Genetic screening part of agenda for NCJW

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Recent studies on the genes in the human body and how they are passed from generation to generation may lead to the prevention or cure of many conditions that are caused by genetic irregularities passed from parents to children.

Dr. Annette Feigenbaum, a biochemical geneticist in pediatrics at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children and the University of Toronto, came here from her native South Africa as a research fellow in the late 1980s, just after the genetic mutation causing Tay-Sachs was identified.

In many cases, she says, we now know which genes can lead to which diseases, and it's possible to screen people to see who is at risk.

National Council of Jewish Women of Canada (NCJW) has, therefore, made genetic screening a major, ongoing project for several years.

Lorraine Berk, chair of council's Jewish genetic awareness and testing program, said that when a couple is getting married, "the wedding seems to be the only important thing."

With this in mind, the organization is encouraging rabbis to bring the subject up when speaking to a bride and groom, and during premarital courses. Rabbis have been very co-operative, Berk said.

Populations that tend to marry among themselves, such as Jews, share many of the same genetic traits, including problematic ones. So, blacks, for instance, are more susceptible to sickle cell anemia, and people from the Mediterranean area, thalassemia. Ashkenazi Jews have a comparatively high incidence of several conditions, especially Tay-Sachs disease and familial dysautonomia.

One set of genes is inherited from each parent. Some are considered dominant, others recessive. If the gene received from one parent is a dominant one, each child has a 50 per cent chance of inheriting it. A recessive gene only manifests itself if both parents have it. In that case, each child has a 25 per cent chance of inheritance. It is recessive genes that cause such serious conditions as hemophilia, sickle cell anemia and Tay-Sachs disease.

If both members of a couple have a particular recessive gene, they can choose not to marry, not to have children or to test for diseases during pregnancy and either abort the fetus or at least be prepared for what may happen.

Mass screenings of Ashkenazi Jews for Tay-Sachs, for instance, have dramatically lowered the incidence of the disorder by 90 per cent.

OHIP now pays for the testing of several genetic diseases that are more common among Ashkenazi Jews, including Tay-Sachs, familial dysautonomia, Canavan disease, Bloom syndrome, Fanconi anemia, Niemann-Pick disease and mucolipidosis.

Feigenbaum noted that people should be tested even if there is no known family history of problems. "Jews especially have to realize that because of the Holocaust, those histories have often been lost."

Berk had a similar message. Screening should be done "even in cases of intermarriage or if one or both are Sephardi and thus supposedly have a lower incidence of these genetic diseases. You can't be too careful or too safe," she said.

NCJW holds mass screenings for genetic diseases on a periodic basis. For dates or more information in Toronto, call Council House at 416-633-5100. You can also see your family doctor, and ask him to arrange for the test. For more information, about genetic testing, go to www.whatsinyourgenes.com.

Though there are precious few Jewish constituents in her home riding of Riel, and an estimated 14,000 Jews in all of Manitoba, Melnick, who used to live in Toronto's Bathurst and Lawrence area, a locality with a high concentration of Jews, said she has always felt a deep connection to the Jewish people.

"I shopped at Perl's and I found the community was just wonderful. They knew that I wasn't Jewish but they were so kind and generous to me," she said.

Melnick added that she considers Israel a prime example of "social justice in action."

Manitoba's NDP has made similar overtures of solidarity with Jews and Israel in the past.

Last December, Premier Gary Doer issued the following statement on his government's website with regards to the Holocaust denial conference in Iran.

"... I was appalled by the anti-Semitic and anti-Israel statements coming out of Iran... [This gathering] in Iran was a vicious attempt to negate the reality of Jewish suffering and the democratic State of Israel. We stand today in solidarity with all Manitobans, Holocaust survivors, the Jewish people and the State of Israel against anti-Semitism and its destructive forces."

Prior to that, Doer was honoured at a Jewish National Fund gala in recognition of a joint Manitoba-JNF fund to sponsor research on rapid-growth greenhouses, water conservation and forest diversification.

One week before Melnick presented her resolution, she toured Israel with JNF representatives to get first-hand lessons on Israeli innovations in water technology by visiting its waste water management sites.

It was her third trip to the country since 1997.

Manitoba has put great emphasis on protecting its water supplies from pollutants in recent years and is very interested in these technologies.

"Water is life," Melnick said. "Just because we have a lot of water in Manitoba doesn't mean we should be bad stewards. And some of the best [water] stewards in the world are the Israeli people."

Obituary

Abraham Lieff remembered for having 'enriched humanity'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Abraham (Abe) Lieff, the first Jewish lawyer named to the Ontario Supreme Court, the first Jew to take the oath of office holding a Jerusalem Bible and the first to wear a kippah during the ceremony, died on Feb. 12 of heart failure, three weeks before his 104th birthday.

He was eulogized at the Beth Tzedec synagogue in Toronto, where he attended services regularly and where he was honoured for his many contributions to the synagogue and the community.

Lieff was at the forefront of the development of the organized Jewish community in Canada, particularly the Jewish community in Ottawa, where he lived and practised law until he became a superior court judge in 1963.

Known as the father of modern Canadian family law, Lieff broke through many barriers, serving as the head of several non-sectarian organizations, including being president of the Ottawa Kiwanis Club and the first Jewish board member of the Catholic St. Vincent's Hospital.

His former colleagues of the High Court and members of the Court of Appeal held him in high esteem. For his 100th birthday, the Supreme Court (now the Superior Court of Ontario) held a reception in the Lieff Room, which was named in his honour.

To celebrate his lifelong commitment to Judaism, when he turned 100, a sefer Torah was commissioned in his honour by his close friend Joseph Kerzner. It was donated to Beth Tzedec Congregation.

On the occasion of the Torah dedication, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl selected words from Genesis: "Abraham was aged, advanced in days. God had blessed him with everything."

The week before he died, when the rabbi visited Lieff in the hospital, Lieff reiterated the words, "I have had a good life. I am grateful for what God has given me."

In his eulogy, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl referred to those words: "We too are grateful to God for having given us Abraham Lieff for so many years. He was a vibrant and strong link to Sinai and he enriched humanity. He was a blessing."

The Lieff Torah was taken to Camp Ramah every summer for the religious services. Lieff, who was a great supporter of Jewish education and camping, regularly attended a special service at the camp, where he participated in the davening and addressed the campers in his soft-spoken, charismatic manner, relating events of his life and sprinkling his talk with religious parables and talmudic wisdom.

Abraham Lieff

Lieff was one of seven children born to Esther and Bernard Lifshitz. He was born in the then-White Russian shtetl of Antopol in the province of Grodno. The family fled the anti-Semitic pogrom there in 1904 and came to Ottawa when Lieff was one year old.

The family settled in Ottawa's Lower Town district, where Lieff's father worked as a pedlar and later became a Hebrew teacher to avoid working on the Sabbath.

Lieff became familiar with Torah and Psalms from an early age, and this exposure to religious texts had a great influence on him throughout his life. He was known for speaking to lawyers and clients and including lessons from the Bible in his talks.

Raised in poverty, the young Lieff worked as a newsboy, bellhop and soda jerk. He played the banjo and the guitar, playing at his high school dances and as an extra at Ottawa's old Russel Theatre.

He attended Ottawa Collegiate Institute and was called to the bar at Toronto's Osgoode Hall Law School in 1926. He worked his way through school and became active in Jewish youth programs. While at law school, he taught Sunday school at Holy Blossom Temple.

Lieff's first appointment as a law student was with Benjamin Goldfield. He became Ottawa's first, and at that time, only Jewish lawyer. He later established his own practice and took on all types of cases. He became the assistant Crown attorney and a magistrate in Carleton County.

He met his wife, Sadie Lazarovitz, at a Young Judaea conference in Ottawa in 1925 when they were both in law school. They married in 1929 and had a lifelong love affair. Sadie died in 1999.

Lieff became involved with the Zionist organization Young Judaea as a young man and continued to support his beloved State of Israel throughout his life.

He also became active with the Liberal party of Canada.

In the early 1940s, Lieff led the movement to establish Ottawa's first Conservative congregation, the Agudath Israel Synagogue, where he served as president for 17 years and presided at the opening of the new building in 1949.

When he was appointed to the Supreme Court of Ontario, the Lieffs moved to Toronto, and although Lieff lived in Toronto for more than four decades, he continued to have deep roots in the Ottawa community.

Lieff received numerous honours, including a human relations award from the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews in 1976. An annual Lieff scholarship for excellence in family law at the Law Society of Upper Canada was established in 1978.

Over the years, he was an inspiration to everyone he met, and despite his age, he always looked forward to the future with enthusiasm. A perpetual student, he studied at the University of Toronto's Jewish studies program to the age of 97.

He published a series of autobiographical memoirs titled Gathering Rosebuds, and he was working on his ninth volume at the time of his death.

He had already prepared his speech for next August as he looked forward to being at Camp Ramah. He also looked forward to his 104th birthday which was to take place on March 5. The family plans to celebrate his life on that day.

Lieff's granddaughter Ellin Bessner, who spoke at the funeral, said, "No one was ready for this. We felt that he would go on forever."

Lieff inspired by example, his daughter Lois said. "We, his children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren, each in our own way, have devoted our lives to making the world a better and more pleasant place to live in. Paying your rent, he always called it. I like to think that the Lieffs haven't fallen too far from the tree."

The interment was at the Ottawa Jewish Community Cemetery, Agudath Israel Section.

Lieff is survived by his daughter and her friend, Miriam Lieff and Albert Goldberg, daughter Lois Lieff, sister Bess Narod, brother and sisters-in-law Joe and Evelyn Lieff, Dorothy Lieff, Daisy Friedberg and Marge Lazarovitz; grandchildren Stephen Cohen and Pernille Rorth, Lisa Cohen, Sharon Cohen and Eric Barker, Ellin Bessner and John Friedlan, Brenda and Kenny Adessky; and seven great-grandchildren.

Kosher chef highlight of NCSY dinner

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A women's dinner hosted by National Conference of Synagogue Youth, March 7 at Copper Creek Golf Club, features executive chef Jeffrey Nathan.

The cookbook author, cooking show host, food columnist and New York City restaurateur will do a cooking demonstration of each course before it is served.

Funds raised from the evening will go to NCSY's Torah High, an after-school Judaic studies program that operates in a number of locations across the Greater Toronto Area.

Nathan is executive chef of Abigael's Group, which includes Abigael's on Broadway, the world's largest kosher restaurant, and the Green Tea Lounge, an Asian fusion lounge located upstairs from Abigael's that offers specialities from Vietnam, Malaysia, Thailand, Korea, China and Japan.

He is also the author of Adventures in Jewish Cooking, and Jeff Nathan's Family Suppers.

In a phone interview from his restaurant, Nathan said that Abigael's is a restaurant "that just happens to be kosher. I serve modern food with global influences. Keeping kosher is not a challenge. We're located in midtown Manhattan, so we have a mix of kosher and non-kosher clientele."

Almost any dish can be made kosher, he said, so there really is no definition of kosher cuisine. "Kosher is now mainstream. Twelve years ago we couldn't get kosher sushi. Now, it's commonplace, and it's delicious.

"Kosher consumers are demanding. They want to eat what everyone else is eating, and people in the food industry know that. Every year there are more and more kosher products available."

The cooking demonstration, his first in Toronto, will be interactive, he said. Among other dishes, "I will probably be demonstrating stuffed chicken, and I'll talk about deboning it and stuffing it. I want people to ask questions. The more they ask, the happier I am. It means they're interested in what I'm doing."

TILAPIA TERIYAKI WITH STIR-FRIED ASIAN VEGETABLES

Teriyaki sauce:
1 cup sweet white wine
1 cup soya sauce
2 tbsp. sugar
1½ tsp. finely chopped fresh ginger
1 tsp. ketchup
1 small garlic clove finely chopped
2 tsp. cornstarch
2 tbsp. cold water

Fish:
2 tbsp. canola oil
6 6-7 oz. tilapia fillets
½ tsp. kosher salt
¼ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
½ cup flour
1 tbsp. finely chopped fresh ginger
2 garlic cloves, finely chopped
3 oz. snow peas, cut in halves on the bias
1 red pepper, cored, seeded and cut into ¼-in.-wide strips
3 oz. shiitake mushrooms, stems removed, caps cut into ¼-in.-wide strips

To make the sauce, bring the wine, soya sauce, sugar, ginger, ketchup and garlic to a boil in a medium saucepan over medium heat, stirring often. Sprinkle the cornstarch over 2 tbsp. cold water in a small bowl and stir to dissolve. Stir into the simmering sauce and cook just until thickened. Set aside. (The sauce can be cooled and refrigerated in a covered container for up to two months.)

Heat 1 tbsp. oil in a very large nonstick skillet over medium-high heat. Season the fillets with salt and pepper. Spread the flour on a plate. Dip the fillets on both sides in flour and shake off the excess. Place in the skillet and cook until the underside is lightly browned, about 2½ minutes. Turn and brown the other side, about 2½ minutes more Transfer the fish to a plate and tent with aluminum foil to keep warm. Wipe out the skillet with paper towels.

Add the remaining 1 tbsp. of oil to the skillet and heat over high heat. Add the ginger and garlic and stir until fragrant, about 30 seconds. Add the snow peas, bell pepper and mushrooms and stir fry until crisp-tender, about 2½ minutes. Add 3 tbsp. of the teriyaki sauce, and stir until heated through. Heap the vegetables on the fish.

Serve hot, with the remaining sauce on the side, if desired. Makes four servings.

Purim then and now

By NORENE GILLETZ

The best-known treats for Purim are hamantaschen, the scrumptious three-cornered pastries shaped like Haman's three-cornered hat. Everyone has a preference for a certain type of dough, either crisp cookie dough or tender yeast dough. The delectable dough encases a variety of fillings, depending on family traditions.

The best-known fillings are poppy seeds (mun) or prunes (lekvar), which can be bought already prepared for those who are short on time. Other tasty fillings are finely ground dates or dried apricots, or thick jam or preserves. A mixture of three or four finely ground dried fruits, such as pitted prunes, dates, raisins and cranberries, along with a little lemon juice, rind and a drizzle of honey, also makes for a marvellous, tasty filling.

The food processor grinds the fruit filling mixture to a perfect texture in seconds – certainly a time-saver compared to using a "milchel" (an old-fashioned grinder), which my grandmother used to attach to her metal-topped kitchen table by turning the screws tightly to secure it, along with a little help from yours truly, holding on tightly so the grinder wouldn't slip while my bubba diligently turned the handle and the golden filling was extruded through the small round holes.

It is a long-standing tradition on Purim to send mishloach manot, baskets containing food gifts of fruit, candy and cookies, to friends and family.

Last spring, I met Ellen Rosen of London, Ont., at a surprise birthday party for a mutual friend and she kindly shared the following food memory and her hamantaschen recipe with me.

Ellen wrote: "In my first year of university, I had a classmate who brought hamantaschen to school. They were the best I had ever tasted. My mother made them every year, but each time they turned out either too dry, too runny, or just not great. When I tasted these, they were as Goldilocks said – just right! I asked for the recipe and her mother gave it willingly. I asked my mother to make this recipe from then on, and I continued to use it for the next 38 years after I got married. I have altered it by using orange liqueur or even whiskey on occasions when I didn't have orange juice. It seems to be foolproof if you know how to manage dough. My family who are quite fussy love them."

ELLEN ROSEN'S 'JUST RIGHT' HAMANTASCHEN

Filling:
1 lb. (500 g) pitted prunes
1 cup raisins (such as Thompson)
2 or 3 soda crackers (or melba toast)
1/2 cup walnuts
1/2 cup sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon
2 tsp. lemon juice
orange liqueur or orange juice, to taste

Process the prunes and raisins on the steel blade of the food processor until coarsely ground, about 12 to 15 seconds. Add the crackers and walnuts, then process with 3 or 4 quick on/offs, until finely chopped. Add the sugar, cinnamon and lemon juice and process just until combined. Add liqueur to taste, making the filling smooth enough to be able to spoon onto the dough.

Dough:
4 eggs, lightly beaten
1/4 cup vegetable oil
1/2 cup sugar
1 1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp salt
3 cups (approximately) all-purpose flour
1 beaten egg (for glazing)

In the large bowl of an electric mixer, beat eggs and oil together until light. Gradually add the sugar, baking powder, salt and 2 cups of the flour. Mix on low speed to combine, scraping down the sides of the bowl with a rubber spatula. Gradually add the last cup of flour, making a soft dough which is not sticky. If necessary, add a little extra flour.

Divide the dough into 4 sections and roll out each piece as thinly as possible on a well-floured surface into a large rectangle. Cut the dough into 3-inch rounds (or whatever size you like) with a round cookie cutter. Place a spoonful of filling in the centre of each circle. Shape into triangles by folding sides in towards the middle. Arrange the triangles on the prepared baking sheet(s), leaving 2 inches between each one. Lightly brush the tops and sides with beaten egg. Bake on the middle rack of the oven at 350 for 20 minutes, or until golden. Makes about 5 dozen.

If you are looking for a unique item for a mishloach manot gift, be sure to make this giant chocolate chip cookie, which is a new spin on an old favourite. It's so easy to make that even young kids can help mix up the dough, pat it into the pizza pan, and then decorate it, developing their creative skills. The recipe comes from one of my favourite cookbooks – Divine™ Kosher Cuisine: Catering to Family and Friends, compiled by two very talented, hard-working women, Barbara Wasser and Rise Routenberg, and their large group of dedicated volunteers. The beautifully designed cookbook is a fundraising project of Congregation Agudat Achim of Niskayuna, N.Y.

The book is available at several Judaica gift shops in the Toronto area. Here is just one example from the hundreds of creative, delicious recipes in Divine™ Kosher that are ideal for every day use or for special occasions.

GIANT CHOCOLATE CHIP COOKIE

1/2 cup butter for dairy, room temperature (use margarine for pareve)
1/3 cup brown sugar, firmly packed
1/4 cup sugar
1 large egg
1 tsp. vanilla extract
1 1/3 cups flour
1/2 tsp. baking soda
1/4 tsp. salt
1/2 cup chocolate chips
1/4 cup chopped nuts decorating icing (below)

Preheat oven to 350 and grease a 12-inch pizza pan.

Cream butter or margarine with sugars at medium speed with an electric mixer. Beat in egg and vanilla. Mix in flour, baking soda and salt. Fold in chocolate chips and nuts. Spread into pizza pan and bake for 15 to 20 minutes, until golden brown.

Frost and decorate if desired. Write "Chag Purim" or your desired message on the frosted cookie. Decorate with coloured sprinkles. Cut into wedges or break into pieces. Makes 12 to 16 servings.

Decorating icing:
2 cups confectioners' sugar
1/2 tsp. vanilla extract
2 tbsp. milk, as needed food coloring

Beat sugar, vanilla and milk at medium speed with electric mixer until smooth. Thin frosting with additional milk as needed. Tint frosting with food colouring.

Channels open with Abbas, but not new gov't: Olmert

By ALUF BENN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel will maintain contact with Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas, but not with the new Palestinian unity government, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Monday.

"We have to maintain a channel of communications with the Palestinians, and the only possible conduit is the Palestinian president," Olmert told his Kadima party colleagues after a two-hour morning meeting with Abbas and U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The international community has demanded that any Palestinian government recognize Israel, accept previous peace deals and renounce violence, but the unity government deal, forged earlier this month in Mecca, only pledges to respect past peace agreements.

Abbas aide and senior Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said after the meeting Monday that Olmert and Rice reiterated the conditions to Abbas.

The prime minister told Kadima lawmakers that he and Abbas agreed to maintain an open channel of communication, which would focus primarily on the need to improve the lives of the Palestinian people in various areas and a continued war on terror by the Palestinian Authority – in practice – to bring terror to a complete halt.

Erekat said the two leaders also discussed a possible extension of the three-month-old ceasefire in the Gaza Strip to include the West Bank.

In a statement to the press after the three-way talks, Rice said Olmert and Abbas agreed to meet again, and that she expected to return to the region soon.

She said the two sides repeated their commitment to the internationally brokered road map to Middle East peace and to American involvement in negotiations.

"The president and prime minister agreed that they would meet together again soon. They reiterated their desire for American participation and leadership to overcome obstacles, rally regional and international support and move forward toward peace. In that vein, I expect to return to the region soon," she said.

"All three of us affirmed our commitment to a two-state solution, agreed that a Palestinian state cannot be born of violence and terror," she said. Neither Abbas nor Olmert joined Rice as she delivered her brief statement to reporters, and she exited the room without taking questions.

Rice told American journalists Sunday night that Washington would withhold judgment on the coalition agreement until it was fleshed out. But she acknowledged that the outlines did not meet the demands of the international Quartet of Middle East negotiators – the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia.

"If there's going to be a Palestinian state, then the Quartet principles would obviously have to be recognized because… this is the foundation for peace," she said. "I haven't seen anything to date that suggests that this is a government that's going to meet the Quartet's principles, but you know… we will see once the government is formed," she said.

Rice held separate meetings Sunday with Olmert and Abbas. She also held talks with Defence Minister Amir Peretz, who was accompanied by Chief of Military Intelligence Amos Yadlin. She met separately with the likely future Palestinian finance minister, Salam Fayyad, and U.S. Senator John McCain, who is also in the region.

The United States and Israel made no promises to the PA on the eve of the summit. According to participants, Abbas presented the considerations which led to his agreeing to the unity government deal reached in Mecca.

Abbas asked Rice to consider the positive aspects of the Mecca agreement, for instance Hamas' undertaking to honour the decisions of the Palestinian National Council, which include the Oslo accords and mutual recognition with Israel.

Compromise reached for mixed minyan Kotel prayer

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — Every year hundreds of Jews – men and women together – and many of them from abroad, gather to pray at the southernmost edge of the Western Wall at an archeological site called Robinson's Arch.

Until an agreement was reached between Israel's Conservative movement and the government on Feb. 11, those worshippers were charged a fee to pray.

On the eve of a lawsuit by the movement against the government and other organizations involved in the Western Wall area, the government came up with a compromise plan in which worshippers would be able to hold free services until 10:30 in the morning on weekdays, and on Friday evenings and holidays.

A situation "was created where someone who wanted to pray at the Western Wall as an Orthodox Jew could pray as frequently as they wanted and with no entry fee, and we were in a situation where if someone wanted a mixed minyan, they would have to pay to pray," said Rabbi Andy Sacks, director of the rabbinical assembly in Israel for the Masorti movement, the name of the Conservative stream in Israel.

Rabbi Sacks welcomed the compromise solution.

"Ultimately what is important here is the recognition on the part of the government that those whose praying is not in keeping with Orthodox customs but their own customs have to be accommodated, and that the government must provide for their needs as well," he said.

The decision to have a legally sanctioned area for Jews who wanted to pray in mixed minyans at the Western Wall followed violent attacks on mixed groups praying with Torah scrolls in 1998 and 1999.

The worshippers were pelted with stones and reportedly even feces-filled diapers by fervently Orthodox worshippers who were enraged at the sight of women and men praying together at the rear of the Western Wall plaza.

At the time, a deal was made that worshippers seeking to pray in egalitarian services would be allowed to do so at Robinson's Arch, an archeological site at the far southern edge of the Western Wall.

About two years ago, the archeological park that oversees the site began charging worshippers who came to pray after 8 a.m., claiming the groups were bothersome to tourists, according to Sacks.

Zundel gets five years for inciting hate

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Longtime neo-Nazi propagandist Ernst Zundel will be spending yet more time behind bars.

Last week a judge in Mannheim, Germany sentenced the 67-year-old publisher to five years in jail on 14 counts of inciting hatred, including Holocaust denial.

Zundel's copious writings – in print and on the Internet – did him in. In closing arguments, prosecutor Andreas Grossmann quoted Zundel's claim that millions of Jews did not die in the Holocaust. Grossman called Zundel a "political con man" and said, "You might as well argue that the sun rises in the west...But you cannot change that the Holocaust has been proved," CP reported.

Zundel said he would appeal.

During the trial, which began in November 2006, Zundel's German lawyers attempted to question the Holocaust – a strategy employed by Zundel at his many Canadian trials. At one point, Zundel's lawyers proposed calling two expert witnesses, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez. Zundel's website reported they were to testify "as to the harmful consequences of keeping the world in the dark by pretending the Holocaust was what it purported to be – a 'fact of history'." They were not allowed to testify.

Zundel, who was born in Germany but who moved to Canada in 1958, has spent the last few years in jail. After announcing he was fed up with the Canadian legal system, he moved to Tennessee in 2001 but was deported back to Canada two years later for violating his visa.

He was incarcerated on his return and spent more than two years in jail until a Canadian court in 2005 ordered him removed as a security risk and sent to his native Germany.

From his home in downtown Toronto, Zundel became an international figure in the Holocaust-denial movement. He distributed written material around the world alleging the Jews concocted the Holocaust to extort reparations from Germany and to justify the creation of Israel. He was charged under Canada's false news law for distributing a pamphlet, Did Six Million Really Die? Although convicted by a jury in 1985, the law was subsequently overturned by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Zundel later ran a website that bears his name. When he left to be with his wife, Ingrid Rimland, in Tennessee, it was in the midst of a hearing before a Canadian Human Rights tribunal for using the Internet to expose Jews to hatred or contempt.

The Tribunal ruled in 2002 that the website violated section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act and Zundel was ordered to cease the transmission of hate messages.

German prosecutors referred to the same website in charging Zundel.

Jewish organizations applauded the German verdict.

Ed Morgan, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, said "The court's decision sends a strong message to those who practice this pernicious form of anti-Semitism...The message should be clear that Holocaust denial is neither an expression of historical research nor free speech. It is anti-Semitism, pure and simple."

"For decades, Zundel dedicated himself to spreading the lie that the Holocaust never happened," said Congress CEO Bernie Farber. "Through his publishing house and website he promoted the view of a world Jewish conspiracy. In so doing, Zundel advanced the most vicious anti-Semitic canards while trying to rehabilitate the public image of Adolf Hitler, presenting him as a great man."

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies applauded Germany "for aggressively dealing with those who deny history's most documented atrocity." Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the centre, said, "The sentencing of Ernst Zundel also represents a slap in the face to Iranian President Ahmadinejad's hateful campaign of Holocaust denial that unfortunately has generated too much support in the Arab and Muslim world."

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada said, "Only a few weeks ago, more than 103 countries, including Canada, joined together to co-sponsor a United Nations resolution condemning Holocaust denial, in what was intended as a clear and unequivocal response to Iran. We call on Canada and other nations to emulate the German example, by explicitly recognizing Holocaust denial as a hate crime and giving teeth to this law through its consistent application," Dimant stated.

Israel Briefs

Turkey to check Jerusalem dig

Turkey will send a team to check on Israel's repair work at the Mugrabi Gate outside the Temple Mount. Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, who has joined harsh Islamic denunciations of Israel for repairing a decaying ramp leading to the holy site, announced the move after talks in Ankara with visiting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Olmert said he would welcome Turkish oversight of the work. Muslim leaders have used the project to revive frequent accusations that Israel wants to undermine two Muslim shrines on the Temple Mount. The excavations, carried out by Israel's Antiquities Authority, are meant to scour the site for historical relics that could be damaged by the renovation work to the ramp. In a further move to mollify Muslims, the Antiquities Authority installed a live video broadcast of the excavation on its website: http://www.antiquities.org.il/home_heb.asp.

Saudi prince eyes Tel Aviv

A Saudi prince reportedly is interested in building a Tel Aviv beachfront hotel. Yediot Achronot reported last week that Saudi Prince Al-Walid Bin Talal has submitted plans to the Tel Aviv Municipality for an eight-storey, 150-room hotel. The project reportedly would involve two architects, one Saudi and one Israeli, as well as funding from the Abulafia family, a prominent Arab clan in Jaffa. The Tel Aviv Municipality had no immediate comment.

Soldiers' kin meet pope

Relatives of two Israeli soldiers held by Hezbollah met Pope Benedict XVI to appeal for their release. Five members of the families of Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, whose abduction by Hezbollah last July triggered a month-long war, spoke to Benedict in a Vatican audience last Wednesday. The pope, who already has called for the Lebanese militia to release the hostages or at least provide a sign that they are alive, was sympathetic to the families' plight, Goldwasser's father, Shlomo, said later. "We asked him not to stop the pressure he began to apply on the humanitarian front, the demand for a sign of life, for the boys to be treated properly," Goldwasser said. Israeli investigators concluded that the two reservists were wounded during their capture and that one or both could be dead.

Israelis, Italians team up for museum guide

Israeli and Italian academics invented an individualized museum guide that employs artificial intelligence. Haifa University announced that technology experts from its Caesarea Rothschild Institute, along with counterparts from the Instituto Trentino di Cultura, or ITC-irst of Trento, had developed a hand-held computer that can pinpoint a visitor's location in a museum, find out what interests him or her, play video clips and explanatory presentations, and enable communication with friends in other parts of the museum. Using this accrued knowledge, the guide can tailor future museum visits to the user's preferences.

Palestinians riot around Jerusalem

Palestinians rioted at entry points to Jerusalem to protest a ban stemming from previous riots over an Old City dig. Police banned Palestinian males under age 50 from attending Friday prayer services at mosques on the Temple Mount, and extended a ban on Raed Salah, leader of Israel's Islamic Movement. On Friday, he called for a Muslim intifada to "save" the mosque from the Jews. The Israelis "want to build their temple while our blood is on their clothing, on their doorposts, in their food and in their water," Salah said. Salah has frequently concocted imaginary Jewish plots against the Temple Mount to incite his public against Israel. Israeli Public Security Minister Avi Dichter asked the attorney general to investigate whether Salah's comments constitute incitement and sedition.

Israel & the Jewish World

Test ahead for German-Israeli ties?

By TOBY AXELROD
JTA

BERLIN — A new study reveals popular German ambivalence about supporting Israel, just as Iran has raised the level of tension with repeated threats to destroy the Jewish state.

The gap that shows up in a new Bertelsmann Foundation /TNS Emnid survey suggests trouble ahead in Germany's support for the Jewish state. Germany currently is Israel's most important supporter, in economic and defence terms, after the United States.

Not all signs are bad: the fact that half of German respondents supported sending German troops to monitor the Lebanese-Israeli border after last summer's war is "impressive," said Deidre Berger, head of the American Jewish Committee's Berlin office. In addition, she noted, the study shows a slight decrease in anti-Semitic attitudes since a similar survey was conducted in 1991.

In its entirety, the study suggests an urgent need for further German-Israeli dialogue, particularly among younger generations. "Strategic partnerships" also are needed "in the realms of foreign policy and security policy as well as in economic relations," according to a statement released by Stephan Vopel, project director of the Bertelsmann Foundation's German-Jewish Dialogue.

The dialogue, an annual program that began in 1992, brings together prominent Jewish leaders from around the world and German decision makers from politics, business, the arts and media. Sponsored by the Bertelsmann Foundation and British publisher Lord George Weidenfeld, the two-day event ended Feb. 13 in Berlin.

For decades German leaders, particularly those in the former West Germany, have emphasized Germany's special responsibility toward Israel in light of the Holocaust. This special relationship is constantly being tested, most recently with the Lebanon war last summer, and today with debate over how to respond to a worst-case scenario involving Iran's pursuit of nuclear weapons.

"The finding that four out of five Germans no longer believe in a special relationship between Germany and Israel is disturbing but not unexpected," Berger told JTA.

"With growing distance from the Holocaust, and a growing distance among the German public toward maintaining close German-Israeli relations, politicians might feel pressured to act in closer sync with public opinion," she said. "The potential for such a development is considerable."

While 62 per cent of Germans believe Iran's nuclear ambitions threaten Israel's existence, only 30 per cent would support military intervention against Iran if it obtained a nuclear weapon, the survey found.

The survey showed that three-quarters of Israelis and American Jews believe Israel's existence is threatened by Iran's nuclear ambitions.

It was based on telephone interviews Jan. 12 to 26 with 1,004 Germans, 1,115 Israelis and 500 American Jews.

The report was issued on the heels of the 43rd Munich Conference on Security Policy, where German Chancellor Angela Merkel spoke of sanctions if Iran fails to comply with UN Security Council resolutions restricting its uranium enrichment. Merkel has repeatedly condemned Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's remarks denying the Holocaust and calling for Israel's destruction.

While about 80 per cent of Israelis and almost 75 per cent of American Jews would consider a military strike against Iran justifiable if Iran gets the bomb, 61 per cent of Germans would oppose such a move.

The survey aimed to shed light on public perception of Germany and Israel, and on relationships between non-Jewish Germans, Israelis and American Jews. The Israelis surveyed included non-Jews.

In one of its more disturbing findings, the '07 survey indicated that 30 per cent of Germans think Israel is doing to the Palestinians "what the Nazis did to the Jews in the Third Reich."

"Experts believe this is a transference of anti-Semitic attitudes onto current Israeli political behaviour," said Berger of the AJCommittee, which has commissioned several studies on media and public attitudes toward Israel, as well as on anti-Semitism. "The two situations – a democratic government defending itself versus a totalitarian government on a campaign of extermination – have no basis for comparison."

The survey also revealed significant gaps among the three groups of respondents in perceptions of each other.

Four out of five Germans favour treating Israel like any other state, while most Israelis believe Germany has a special responsibility toward them.

And while Israelis and American Jews tend to have a positive opinion of Germany, most Germans have negative views of Israel.

Other results:

• More Israelis than American Jews say their attitudes toward Germans are greatly influenced by the Holocaust, while Germans underestimate that influence.

• Four out of 10 Germans, particularly older people or those with little education, believe Nazism also had its good sides. But the number of those who feel this way has dropped since the 1991 survey.

• About 12 per cent of Germans believe Jews were partly to blame for the persecution they suffered. Those who are older and less educated tend to agree more with this view.

• One-third of Germans agree with the assertion that "Jews have too much influence in the world." The proportion of people holding this view decreased slightly since the 1991 survey.

• About one-third of Germans agree somewhat – and 10 per cent agree completely – with the idea that Jews are trying to benefit from the Third Reich. These numbers have decreased significantly since 1991.

• About 44 per cent of Germans hold some classic anti-Semitic views. Fifteen per cent of German respondents made an anti-Semitic remark in more than one response to the questions asked. Compared with the 1991 results, that was a slight decline.

• Three-quarters of Israeli Jews interviewed welcomed the deployment of German armed forces in Lebanon to keep the ceasefire that ended last summer's war with Hezbollah. In Germany, opinion is almost evenly divided.

• German interest in information about Israel is middling to weak – but higher than Israeli interest in information about Germany.

• Only 58 per cent of Israelis know who German Chancellor Angela Merkel is, but those who know her give her good marks. U.S. President W. Bush is even more popular. On the other hand, Israelis dislike French President Jacques Chirac and Russian President Vladimir Putin.

Iran defies UN

JTA

NEW YORK — Iran signalled that it will not honour a UN demand to halt sensitive nuclear projects.

The Foreign Ministry in Tehran announced Sunday that Iran has no intention of meeting a Feb. 21 deadline set by the UN Security Council for suspending uranium enrichment.

Under Security Council Resolution 1737, which was passed in late December, Iran was subjected to limited international sanctions, which could be expanded should it defy the 60-day deadline on uranium enrichment, a key potential process for making nuclear bombs.

While China and Russia surprised other Security Council members by backing the original resolution, it remains unclear whether they would support further sanctions given their robust trade ties with Tehran and public skepticism over whether the Iranians seek nuclear weapons.

BETH ZION CONGREGATION

REQUIRES FULL-TIME RABBI

Beth Zion Synagogue, a dynamic Ashkenazi, Modern Orthodox, Zionist congregation established in the mid-1950's is seeking a Congregational Rabbi to replace the incumbent of 50 years who recently retired. Our synagogue services a membership of 650-700 families, and provides an active focal point for the community of Cote Saint Luc, a local suburb of Montreal, including daily and Shabbat services, a dynamic adult education center (The Rabbi Sidney Shoham Institute), an active youth program, an adjoining day-care facility, and a satellite seniors center.

The ideal candidate should be a teacher and motivator, able to relate to all age and demographic groups that make up our diverse membership. He must be a graduate of a recognized Orthodox Smicha program, and have previous experience in congregational leadership. Related graduate degrees are an asset. The Rabbi will devote himself full-time to the synagogue and is responsible for all matters pertaining to Halachah. He will be expected to contribute to all facets of the congregational programming, as well as to fundraising. Ideally, we are searching for a Rabbinic couple where both partners will serve as an example and take an active role in the leadership and development of the synagogue.

Salary and benefits will be commensurate with experience. Interested and qualified candidates should send their CV's to:

Polish politician blasts Jews

By DINAH A. SPRITZER
JTA

PRAGUE — A Polish member of the European Parliament has published a booklet suggesting that Jews are unethical, obsessed with separateness, and a "tragic community," because they don't accept Jesus as the messiah.

The extreme right-wing parliamentarian Maciej Giertych, an influential member of the nationalistic, Catholic-based League of Polish Families, released Civilization at War in Europe on Feb. 14 at the European Parliament headquarters in Strasbourg.

Giertych's son, Roman, Poland's education minister and deputy prime minister, now heads the league, which has been battling anti-Semitism for years.

The 32-page booklet by the elder Giertych tries to prove that European culture, education and morality should be the province of only one civilization. Poland and other parts of Europe are depicted as having a Catholic core that cannot coexist with what he depicts as the Jews' Torah-based civilization.

After reading the booklet on Giertych's website, www.giertych.pl, the executive director of the European Jewish Congress said his organization will investigate the legality of the publication.

"It is quite amazing that a member of the European Parliament referred to racial theories of the pre-World War II era reflecting empty prejudices and the ugliest anti-Semitic clichés," Serge Cwajgenbaum said. He also called upon the younger Giertych to renounce his father's work.

Maciej Giertych, a professor of biology at the Polish Academy of Sciences, writes of Jews: "It is a civilization of programmed separateness, of programmed differentiation from the surrounding communities… By their own will, they prefer to live a separate life, in apartheid from the surrounding communities. They form their own communes (kahals), they govern themselves by their own rule and they take care to maintain also a spatial separateness. They form the ghettos themselves, as districts in which they live together, comparable to the Chinatowns in the U.S.A."

The elder Giertych told JTA that the booklet represents not his thoughts, but the philosophy of Polish historian and philosopher Feliks Koneczny, a 1930s-era philosopher whom some accused of anti-Semitism.

"I am promoting the teachings. They are very good ideas, and they should be followed," Giertych said. "I subscribe to his methods."

Asked if Koneczny's views weren't discriminatory and outdated, Giertych said that even though they were written before the State of Israel's birth, they address an issue that hasn't changed for centuries and that pertains to various civilizations "like the Chinese and many others, not just the Jews."

Rafal Pankowski of Never Again, a Polish anti-racism organization, noted that for decades, Giertych has championed the philosophy of Koneczny, who suggested that Jews and Catholics could not live in the same country because Jews were lawless and immoral.

Pankowski said Giertych was only repeating what was a core philosophy of the League of Polish Families, a junior partner in the Polish government's fragile three-party coalition.

"This book is consistent with his previous writings, as disappointing as that may be," said Pankowski, who noted that the father-and-son team was under fire for recently denying the existence of evolution.

The League of Polish Families is a post-1989 revival of Endejca, an early 20th-century party that used violence in an attempt to reduce the Jewish presence at universities. Some of the league's admirers have a neo-Nazi past.

One of the 1930s stereotypes revived by Giertych, who also was inspired by Endejca leader Roman Dmowski, is that of Jews as greedy conspirators.

"They settle among other civilizations, preferably among the rich," the book says of Jews, paraphrasing Koneczny. "They tend to migrate from poorer to richer lands. They do so always as a group, immediately forming their own separate community."

Another section addresses the age-old stereotype that Jews use the Torah, Talmud and other commentaries hypocritically to produce ethical rules of convenience, allowing for "a constant casuistry, multiplying exceptions to immutable rules."

Giertych warns of the influence of this philosophy on Latin civilizations, meaning Christian Europe. But he denies suggesting that Europe's values are Christian values.

"I am saying that we in Europe make our laws according to ethics, not the Torah," Giertych said.

Asked how he thought Israelis made their laws, he responded, "the Torah."

Piotr Kadlcik, president of the Union of Jewish Religious Communities in Poland, said there was not anything directly anti-Semitic in Giertych's book, but it was full of "dangerous thoughts that could elicit anti-Semitism."

He added dryly, "There is no mention of making matzahs out of Christian blood," a reference to medieval blood libels against Jews.

Giertych's book was issued only a month after the formation of a new far-right European Parliament grouping that includes members from parties with a history of anti-Semitism in France, Austria, Romania and Bulgaria. None of those parties, however, has members sitting in a country's governing coalition.

"It is not acceptable for such views to be expressed by a member of the European Parliament," Pankowski said. "The sadder thing is that such people have a role in running [Poland]."

March of the Living film focuses on Toronto teens

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Every year thousands of high school students from around the world commemorate Holocaust Remembrance Day and Israel Independence Day by embarking on the March of The Living.

Teens on the March visit Poland, where they walk from Auschwitz to Birkenau, and Israel.

Last April, Igal Hecht and Elad Winkler of Chutzpah Productions, known for their controversial documentaries, were commissioned by March of the Living Canada to produce a film about 175 students from Toronto who went on the trip.

Outside a Polish town.

The emotional documentary they produced, March of the Living, which airs Feb. 25 on Israel Today on CTS (cable 9 in Toronto) at 9 p.m., is a worthwhile record of this annual pilgrimage.

In their typical style, Hecht and Winkler capture the emotions of the story. They use a low-key approach without narration, focusing on the students and the expressions on their faces as they walk through the crematoriums and the cemeteries and listen to the tales of survivors.

In Auschwitz, they wave their Israeli flags, a testament to the survival of the Jewish people. They visit the town of Tarnow, whose population in 1939 was almost half Jewish. Today, no Jews live there. In Tarnow, the students dance and sing songs to honour their dead ancestors.

Especially moving is their visit to the gas chambers in Majdanek.

In Warsaw, they meet with Polish students and discuss their experiences with them. They also visit a cemetery where 70,000 Warsaw Ghetto victims are buried in a mass grave. In Warsaw, the students are harassed by a couple of men who yell, "Jews go away."

"You can't really imagine it," one participant says.

While you can't imagine it, this documentary will help future participants get a feel for what to expect. Well worth watching.

CAST OF 60 SET TO PERFORM ONCE UPON A PURIM AT BETH TZEDEC

With about 60 people in the cast and dozens more building sets, working on costumes and readying other details, the upcoming production of Once Upon a Purim: A Megillah Fairy Tale at Beth Tzedec has involved a not insignificant portion of the congregation.

The nearly 100 people active at rehearsals or behind the scenes in the production include "five past presidents, six couples and one entire family," said Aliza Spiro, the show's lyricist, whose husband and co-author, Simon Spiro, the synagogue's recently acquired cantor, will conduct the orchestra through various tunes from Disney films.

A comic reworking of the first seven chapters of the Scroll of Esther, Beth Tzedec's homemade Purim shpiel also features three congregational rabbis and four rebbetzins, the latter impersonating four wicked witches.

Also incorporated into the play's "dramatis personae" are an assortment of ogres and "Purim pixies" with names like Silly and Megilly, to be played by children. The actors range in age from four to 75.

"After the auditions we did a lot of rewriting," said lyricist Spiro. "We tailored the show to include everyone who wants to participate, and if we discover someone's hidden talents, we do what we can to show off those talents."

An American singer-songwriter from the New England area, Spiro has won awards for her performances in the cabaret circuit in and around New York.

Simon Spiro, too, has a rich background in show business: the London, England-born cantor has become a leading interpreter of traditional chazzanut as well as songs from the Yiddish theatre, and even sang in a production of Phantom of the Opera in Singapore.

His album of cantorial selections has become the bestselling CD of the Milken Archives of Jewish music. Both husband and wife have had hit songs on the Israeli charts.

A great spirit of camaraderie has developed among the cast members of Once Upon a Purim, said Spiro, and the show promises to deliver "a lot of colour, a lot of splash and great songs."

Performances are on Saturday, March 3, about 8:30 p.m. and Sunday, March 4, about 3 p.m. after the Megillah reading. Beth Tzedec, 1700 Bathurst St. The auditorium holds 500, so space may be limited. Refreshments served at intermission; admission free but donations welcome. 416-781-3511

Names in the News: Regular theatre-goers may be familiar with the name of Dmitry Chepovetsky, a 37-year-old actor who came to Canada with his family from Ukraine at the age of six, grew up in Regina, and has appeared in many plays, TV shows and movies.

Chepovetsky is also a playwright and is currently appearing in Blind Submission, an experimental piece of theatre that started as three plays, each written by an actor-writer from a different Canadian province. Chepovetsky's section tells of his family's emigration from Russia to Regina, their ability to practise their Judaism freely in Canada, and his life in the theatre.

The L'viv-born actor's family was one of 1,000 Jewish families permitted out of Ukraine about 1976, he told Now magazine several years ago. "We were heading for Israel, but my parents got as far as Austria and decided to go somewhere else," he said. Israel's loss was Canada's gain.

His theatrical credits include appearances in Remnants, The Danish Play, Zadie's Shoes, Jacques Brel, Major Barbara and Picasso at the Lapin Agile. His filmography includes such titles as Man of the Year, Re-Genesis (TV show) and Lucky Number Slevin.

Blind Submission is at the Theatre Centre's Great Hall, 1087 Queen St. W. through Feb. 25. Tickets are $20 or "pay what you think it is worth" on Sundays at 4 p.m. 416-538-0988

Arts Activities for Families: The Bunch Family Salon is an afternoon of art and ideas for kids and parents, described by the organizers as a "symposium for the kidtelligentsia and their parents."

Bunch is a Toronto company that plans events for families such as the popular Family Dance Party series at the Drake Hotel. It was started by two Jewish moms, Lisa Kaplan and Rebecca Brown, who met in a post-natal class at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre.

Salon participants include artist Misha Glouberman, and Janna Levitt and Dean Goodman of Levitt Goodman Architects. Numerous major cultural institutions are also involved, including the Art Gallery of Ontario, Toronto Symphony Orchestra, National Film Board and Royal Conservatory of Music.

Activities include lectures by kids, a percussion petting zoo, art workshop, film-animation exercises and reverse readings in which literary luminaries read stories by kids, who are then interviewed.

Arts and Letters Club, 14 Elm St. $15 adults, $10 kids in advance; $19 and $12 at the door; free for babies under two. (The club has generously suspended its policy excluding children from entry for the afternoon.) Feb. 24, 1 to 4 p.m. www.bunchfamily.ca

Cast and producers of Menopause Out Loud!

Hit show about menopause is 'humour replacement therapy'

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Imagine a musical in which songs and scenes about hot flashes, memory lapses and mood crashes have audiences in stitches.

While such topics aren't normally fodder for humour, more than 60,000 people in Toronto, mostly women, and six million-plus worldwide have laughed heartily when these subjects are presented on stage in Menopause Out Loud!, the self-described "hilarious musical celebration of women and the change."

"It definitely strikes a chord with our target audience, which is primarily women over the age of 40 who are living with menopause," says Kathi Glist, co-producer of the performance along with her husband, Alan, as well as Sandra and Kenneth Greenblatt, who collectively make up the all-Jewish quartet of GFour Productions.

"For so many of these women, they need this release, and when they go to see it, it's their way of living through the change with a sense of humour and laughter. We call it humour replacement therapy," Kathi Glist says.

The show, which will soon be moving from its present location at the Capitol Theatre to the Panasonic Theatre in the Yonge and Bloor area of downtown Toronto, has become somewhat of a chick-flick-on-stage phenom, with groups of women flocking to see it for a girl's night out.

"It's women getting together with friends to share this common bond and laughing together," Glist notes.

The plot centres on a group of four female strangers – an Iowa housewife, a TV soap star, a hippie and a professional woman – who randomly meet at Bloomingdale's and share stories, parody songs and dance about the life-change they're going through.

While entertaining on its own, a key to Menopause's success in Toronto has been the way the show is marketed and packaged.

Enter Mark Zimmerman, the director of marketing and Canadian operations for Menopause Out Loud!, who has helped make the show a dynamic experience.

For instance, before the show starts, audience members are invited to come early for 'estrogin and tonics' and 'moodswing martinis' at Happy Hot Flash Hour.

And rather than handing out a standard program solely about the cast, everyone in attendance receives a glossy, colourful 40-page lifestyle guide, which includes ads, articles and coupons – for travelling, facials and cosmetic surgery.

"It comes back to the fact that I've been doing marketing my whole life," says Zimmerman, a Thornhill resident.

"Because this show is about women, I knew that if I could offer them a night out that's an experience from the moment they walk in the door, that would make the show successful."

Zimmerman adds that having the Toronto Star as the presenting sponsor and inviting the hosts of the radio station CHFI to broadcast free ticket promotions also helped Menopause catch fire.

The production will start playing at its new home on March 23.

ISRAEL TOUR PACKAGES ABOUND

Lots of organizations are organizing tours to Israel, now and into the spring and summer. Here is a sampling:

* * *

Eli Cohen Memorial Tour: Eli Cohen, Israel's man in Damascus, was hanged in a public square in Damascus 42 years ago for providing vital information about Syria to Israel – information that would help Israel liberate the Golan Heights during the Six Day War.

Set for May 13 to 22, the Eli Cohen Memorial Tour of Israel focuses on the events in Cohen's life through the eyes of his brother, Avraham Cohen. Tour participants are scheduled to celebrate the 40th anniversary of the unification of Jerusalem and to meet with high-level military and political leaders. The tour is sponsored by the Eli Cohen Memorial Foundation. E-mail Dan Kransdorf, heartland1@isdn.net.il.

Fit For A King: Jerusalem's legendary King David Hotel opened a magnificent exhibition this month to mark its 75th anniversary. Items on display highlight the architecture and history of the hotel; artifacts include an antique Zenith telephone used in the 1940s, serving utensils used in the dining room, and a chamber pot of the type used in guestrooms until the 1950s. Also on view is the hotel's guest book, with signatures from 1931 to 1990. www.danhotels.com.

Get Studious in Prague: Harry Hurwitz, a retired Canadian professor, is the founder of the Lessing Institute, a Prague-based facility that offers a two-week, intellectually stimulating vacation in Prague. The Institute's Open Mind Studies Program features a series of lectures by university and college faculty members from North America, Europe and Israel.

The focus is on how different cultures interact, Hurwitz explained. "The program isn't religious, but it asks students to understand religions and to use that understanding as a lens through which to view western culture." All lectures are given in English.

Lessing Institute is housed in a former monastery built by the Knights of Malta, and is surrounded by the richness of Prague's history, architecture and culture. The program includes a visit to Bertramka House where Mozart composed Don Giovanni, as well as a performance of the opera as it was done in 1787; a walking tour through streets once roamed by Kafka, Kepler and Dvorak; and a three-day (two-night) excursion to Berlin, with visits to the Pergamon and Jewish museums.

The program runs July 1 to 15 and costs from $2,100 to $2,900 per person, not including air travel and some meals. www.lessinginstitute.com.

Kids love cooking

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. Why don't most of us work with our kids in the kitchen anymore?

A. Food is something that is at the centre of most Jewish traditions and celebrations. If you think of any Jewish holiday or gathering, there is food associated with it, whether it's chicken soup and challah on Shabbat, honey cake on Rosh Hashanah, latkes on Chanukah, matza or bubbelahs on Pesach. There is usually brunch at a bris, lunch or dinner at a simchah.

But it is my observation as times change that while we often still eat the foods we always ate on these occasions, the kids are increasingly less involved or even aware of our wonderful traditions. I think this is because we spend less time cooking and are less likely to ask our kids to help or watch. Many of us will have fond memories of helping our mother or grandmother prepare some of these foods and, of course, loved eating them, but are we still making them? And do our kids know about it?

Kids love cooking, and having them do so with us is a great way for them to develop a healthy relationship with food, to experiment with different things and to feel connected to food and the kitchen. They will also be more interested in eating something that they helped create.

I know that cooking with kids can be messy and often frustrating. I have kids, too, but the benefits outweigh the mess. Ask your kids and grandkids to help. Ask them what they'd be interested in making. Call them into the kitchen when you're preparing the seder plate and explain its significance. Bake a frozen challah together or make a dessert for Shabbat. Or plan the menu together – it's essential so that they will carry on these great traditions.

I know that not everyone has time to make a chicken soup from scratch or roll out fresh rogelach, but create your own traditions and involve your kids and grandkids. Ask your kids today what food reminds them of Shabbat or Pesach or Rosh Hashanah. I guarantee their answers will let you know where to start.

Q. I have noticed something called "probiotics" now appearing on some products in the grocery store, such as milk, juice and yogurt. What is this and what does it do?

A. Probiotics are a growing and important trend in nutrition. Probiotics are good bacteria.

We are all very focused on an antibacterial world and ridding ourselves of bacteria, so why would we want to consume more? Because these are good for your intestines and your overall health.

In our intestinal tract, we have a mix of good and bad bacteria – we're born with the good, and we do produce some as well, but as we age, with stress, antibiotic use, drinking chlorinated water, stomach bugs, etc. we lose some of the good bacteria and, in addition to what our bodies make naturally, we can replenish these bacteria by eating them either in the foods you have mentioned or in a supplement form. Yogurt has always contained probiotics and still does and now they are also being added to other food products.

Probiotics have proven to be very beneficial for people with many gastrointestinal diseases, including irritable bowel syndrome, Crohn's disease, colitis, constipation and lactose intolerance. They may also help ward off stomach bugs or food poisoning. So adding foods containing probiotics to your daily diet is a good idea for people of all ages.

Woody Guthrie meets The Klezmatics

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT

It was an unlikely collaboration - one of the most listened-to guitar troubadours of Depression and Dustbowl America and a modern-retro, Eastern European-Yiddish-influenced klezmer musical group.

Woody Guthrie meets The Klezmatics.

That it was a physically impossible joining of human beings did not mean, thankfully, that it was a physically impossible joining of musical forces and talents.

The Klezmatics, the super-popular and super-talented group that have done so much to make klezmer music accessible and popular in North America to the generation of the grand and great-grandchildren of those for whom klezmer music was their celebratory staple in Europe, have put to music a collection of lyrics written by the folk singing legend Woody Guthrie.

The result is Wonder Wheel, an innovative and deeply pleasing listening achievement that last week received a Grammy award for Contemporary World Music Album.

The fusion of Guthrie and Klezmatics is appropriate at a number of levels.

Guthrie was the voice of and for the downtrodden and forgotten of Depression-era America. He sang for the poor. He sang for the right of everyone to live in dignity. His songs were the clarion of hope for all human beings. Guthrie was the singer of the ordinary folk.

Similarly, half way around the world, at the same time in the last century, in the poverty-riven world that typified most shtetl life in eastern Europe, klezmer music was the music of the ordinary folk, their primary non-synagogue, non-ritualistic musical outlet of distraction and celebration.

The memorable singer and the unique song styles therefore are a fitting cohesion of words and sound.

But the listener should not anticipate an immersion in the distinctive swaying clarinet sounds and minor keys of klezmer only. The musical stylings cover a range that touch even upon Celtic, traditional folk as well as klezmer. It is a rich, inspiring medley.

For example, the song Mermaid's Avenue is a veritable anthem to equality and tolerance. Holy Ground is a universal call that resonates with the urgent call to environmental sanity.

The poetry and lyrics are a selection from Guthrie's days in Brooklyn, culled from the thousands of songs that he wrote and that were, in the main, unpublished. The music by the Klezmatics give his words spiritual lift and, not surprisingly, a lasting reminiscence of the man and the love he sang from his heart for all peoples of the world. Those songs can now nestle in the listeners' heart.

Holocaust books for the young

The Little Boy Star: An Allegory of the Holocaust* by Rachel Hausfater, illustrated by Olivier Latyk, introduced by David A. Adler, Milk & Cookies Press.

Hilde and Eli: Children of the Holocaust* by David A. Adler, illustrated by Karen Ritz, Holiday House.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Reading to children is pleasure. It is also, for the child, a zone of freedom. The books that are read are the ones the child wants to hear. Children have a remarkable willingness to hear a favourite story again and again, and in this they set the program for what gets read. They are equally interested in books that are pure play and those that focus on literacy and learning, on subjects as diverse as the alphabet, dinosaurs, Egypt, English chivalry, vehicular travel and construction sites.

Norman Ravvin

The rise of children's books on the Holocaust represents a trend that runs, in large part, contrary to these patterns. A child could not choose such a book, because she could not conceive of the material under discussion. This is possibly the one instance when the events of the war are truly "inconceivable," as critics and historians often tell us they are. And one would be hard-pressed to counter the argument that by presenting the Holocaust to a six-year-old, or a 10-year-old, one must necessarily change their view of the world and themselves. The stakes are high then, and the offerings in the area – board books, lavishly illustrated, for a variety of ages – are burgeoning.

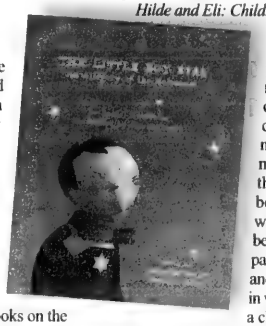
Two titles – one aimed at children at the younger end of scale, the other at elementary school readers – are The Little Boy Star: An Allegory of the Holocaust and Hilde and Eli: Children of the Holocaust.

On the inner flap of The Little Boy Star, its publisher suggests suitability for readers from age four to eight. This is a surprising spread in any context, considering the range of maturity between the two age groups. But one must recognize that the publisher stands to gain by the widest possible audience.

Books about the Holocaust for children often include aspects that are aimed at the parent, and in the case of The Little Boy Star, its subtitle is an example of this approach. An allegory is something university-age students can often not define, let alone eight-year-olds. The Little Boy Star also includes an explanatory introduction by a "specialist," who offers a context for the book's narrative. In this case, historical details are included that are not conveyed in the book proper, and could not be comprehended by the child being read to: "In the years following the First World War," it begins, "Germany was in trouble… Nazi party leader Adolf Hitler campaigned for power… He shouted, waved his fists, and blamed the Jews and others for all his nation's troubles… In the coming months and years, horrible concentration camps were opened… Jews were forced onto trains and taken to concentration camps, which were now death camps."

The Little Boy Star is, in fact, not a story of death camps or political collapse in Germany. It is a tale of hiding, told from the point of view of a small child who is forced to identify himself with the star he must wear. Its illustrations are wonderful, fanciful and stylized. The simple text, laid out like poetic stanzas, begins: "He was a little/ boy who did not know/ he was a star." The "other stars," we are told, "were running in all directions… because the star hunters were getting near." The book's illustrative centrepiece is a striking image – violet blue in its bottom half, black above – showing a toylike train, its yellow headlamp pointing toward buildings, which the adult eye recognizes as Auschwitz.

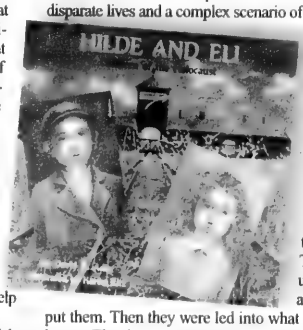
The Little Boy of the title manages to stay "hidden for a long time," until he is released to be taught "how to live again in full daylight." The strengths of The Little Boy Star are its simplicity and its illustrations, which are playful and haunting at the same time. But its story is not the one presented in the book's introduction; exactly how a parent would contextualize the gaps and subtleties introduced by the text is an open question. The mysterious, unexplained train headed toward the iconic outbuildings of Auschwitz is a kind of black hole at its centre. If the five-year-old were to ask, "Daddy, what's that building doing there?" what should the parent answer?



Hilde and Eli: Children of the Holocaust is a larger format book with great educational ambitions. It includes an author's note that places the Holocaust in the context of recent ways of thinking about genocide: " The Nazis did not persecute only Jews. They also killed Romanies, Serbs, Jehovah's Witnesses, homosexuals, Communists, the elderly, the handicapped, the mentally ill, beggars, and Russian prisoners of war." This information cannot truly be for children. In what way could a parent or teacher unpack the meaning and arbitrary quality of this list? And in what way would such an unpacking help a child understand the Holocaust?

Hilde and Eli tells the true-to-life stories of a boy and a girl, the former from Czechoslovakia, the latter from Germany. Each is caught in the Germans' project of destruction in central Europe. We learn of Hilde's death, at the age of 18, in a "freight train crowded with other Jews." Eli, we are told, was 12 when he died at Auschwitz. The illustrations in Hilde and Eli are impressive full-page images, often in close-up, of children's faces, Nazis in uniform, tanks and such details as a half-built ghetto wall. The book's conclusion pulls no punches. Beneath black and white photos of Eli and Hilde, the author concludes, "Jews were shot, gassed and tortured. By May 8, 1945, the day the war in Europe ended, some six million Jews had been murdered by the Nazis. One and a half million of them were children."

The careful use of biography in Hilde and Eli – highlighted by the author's note, which details how Adler received the stories of the two children from their surviving relatives – follows a trend in Holocaust writing to focus on the specific stories of the victims, as well as on survivors. There is nothing allegorical in this effort, as the child who reads the book in some ways comes to "know" the two young people whose lives the book describes. Hilde's childhood was urban and assimilated, while Eli was educated in a cheder in a small Carpathian village. An impressive quality of Hilde and Eli is its compression – the capability to summarize disparate lives and a complex scenario of incarceration and murder in short order.



Picture oneself lying with a child before bed, or standing before a class of elementary schoolchildren, and being asked to explain the book's near to final paragraph: "The Nazis told Eli, his brother, father, and the others that they needed showers. They were told to undress, fold their clothes, and remember where they put them. Then they were led into what looked like a large bathhouse. The doors were locked. Poison pellets were dropped in through an opening in the ceiling. Eli, his brother, and father and all the others in the 'bathhouse' were killed. Later their bodies were burned." Here even typography – in this case the use of scare quotes to signal the ironic nature of the "bathhouse" – calls for further discussion.

The stakes for the adult reader or teacher, with regard to such material, are extremely high. He must be prepared for all kinds of questions in order to answer sensibly and honestly. As well, he must have decided that the child to whom he reads, or to whom he has recommended the book, is ready to enter a new and far more degraded view of the world.

Norman Ravvin's writing on Holocaust literature is collected in A House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory. He is at work on a novel set in contemporary Poland. He is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Blood libel book pulled

By PAUL BOMPARD
JTA

ROME — A new book by an eminent Italian-Israeli historian that revives European blood libels created such an uproar in Italy and abroad that the author has asked his publisher to stop distribution.

Ariel Toaff, who teaches medieval and Renaissance history at Bar-Ilan University in Israel, made the request to Il Mulino of Bologna on Feb. 14.

The next day, Il Mulino issued its first official communique.

"In coming days we will be able, I hope with greater calm and serenity, to define the form and timing of a re-edition," the publisher's history editor, Ugo Berti Arnoaldi, said. "I feel the need to reconfirm to Ariel Toaff my friendship, my full confidence and my solidarity in what is for him such a difficult moment, and so sad for those who have the freedom of research at heart."

The furor didn't hurt sales of Bloody Passover: European Jews and Ritual Murder. The initial run of some 3,000 copies sold out so quickly after it arrived in bookstores Feb. 8 that another edition was planned immediately.

But Toaff was harshly criticized in the Jewish world for writing that Jews in the Middle Ages may have murdered Christian children to use their blood in religious rituals.

Rabbis, Jewish intellectuals and community leaders expressed pained indignation that a reputable Jewish historian should lend support to scenarios that have been cornerstones of rabid anti-Semitism and justification for the violent persecution of Jews.

"A Jewish tradition of this kind has never existed, nor has any indication or custom that allows the ritual use of human blood. The only blood ever spilt was that of many innocent Jews, massacred on the basis of unjust and libelous accusations," a group of Italian rabbis, including Rome's chief rabbi, Riccardo Di Segni, declared in a statement.

Last week, Toaff told Ha'aretz that he had asked Il Mulino to discontinue distribution in order to let him amend contentious sections.

The issue is especially disturbing for Italian Jews because of the book's author. Toaff is the son of Rabbi Elio Toaff, who from 1951 to 2001 was the chief rabbi of Rome, Italy's largest Jewish community. Rabbi Toaff became a beloved and respected figure in Italian Jewry.

In 1986 Rabbi Toaff welcomed Pope John Paul II to Tempio Maggiore, the first visit by a pope to Rome's main synagogue, where they prayed together.

Rabbi Toaff, 91, gave a press interview on Feb. 15 in which he called his son's decision to suspend publication "an opportune gesture, necessary. It means my son Ariel has understood. But it also means that the criticism of the book was justified."

Ariel Toaff

In response to the statement from Italian rabbis, Ariel Toaff said he "simply wanted to verify if the use of Christian blood in the dough for making azzims [matzot] for Pesach was only a stereotype of anti-Jewish prejudice."

Italian Jews weren't the only ones condemning the book.

Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, wrote in a statement, "It is incredible that anyone, much less an Israeli historian, would give legitimacy to the baseless blood libel accusation that has been the source of much suffering and attacks against Jews historically."

Bloody Passover is based on confessions, mostly extorted by torture, of Jews accused of ritual murder. The trials Toaff examines took place in Central Europe from 1100 to 1500, notably the 1475 trial in Trento, in what is today northern Italy, of 13 Jews of German origin. Under torture they confessed to murdering and crucifying a Christian child on the eve of Passover.

Of the 13 – almost all the adult males in Trento's small Ashkenazi community – 11 were burned at the stake. The other two, who had agreed to become Christians, were merely beheaded.

Toaff's thesis is that ritual murders of Christian children may have been committed, and that in the religiously passionate atmosphere of the Middle Ages there were small communities of Ashkenazi fanatics – possibly deranged by persecution, perhaps filled with hate for their Christian tormentors – who took revenge, veiling their actions with a combination of superstition and religious ritual.

Foxman said citing testimony extracted under torture was absurd.

"It is like trying to establish the charge of witchcraft based on the testimony at the Salem witch trials," he said.

The wave of reactions occurred even before the book came out. The furor was sparked Feb. 6 when Italy's foremost daily, Corriere Della Sera, featured a full-page story previewing the publication. The book arrived in stores two days later and sold out in less than 24 hours. A second edition is on its way.

A number of prominent Jewish and non-Jewish intellectuals have written lengthy essays in Italy's daily newspapers, virtually all condemning the book for reviving ancient prejudices and providing ammunition for the most extreme anti-Semites.

"In order to overturn the accepted position that the legend of Jewish blood sacrifices was the construction of anti-Judaism, one would think that Toaff had discovered hitherto unknown sources," wrote Anna Foa, a historian at Rome's La Sapienza University. "In reality it does not seem that Toaff has done so.

At a time when conspiracy theories about Jews are flourishing, Foxman wrote, "Extremist, anti-Semitic and Islamic extremist groups will undoubtedly use this charge to further their hostile aims to the Jewish people."

Magazine for kids launches petition against Iran

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

BabagaNewz, a monthly magazine for Jewish students in North America, has launched a petition in support of indicting the Iranian president on charges of incitement to commit genocide.

Mark Levine, the editor of BabagaNewz, a U.S.-based Jewish classroom magazine for students in grades 4 to 7, hopes to gather 5,000 student signatures on a petition that will urge the International Criminal Court to indict Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who publicly declares his wish to "wipe Israel off the map."

The petition, which can be viewed and signed at www.babaganewz.com/petition-drive, calls on U.S. President George W. Bush, Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, and chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Court Luis Moreno-Ocampo to indict Ahmadinejad on charges of inciting the genocide of the Jewish people, which is a violation of international law.

"We cannot stand by idly as this raeist incitement to mass murder mounts. We cannot stand by idly as Iran openly threatens Israel, a sovereign UN member state. The civilized world has surely learned the lesson of the Holocaust, of Bosnia, and of Rwanda; namely, that we must not stand by when genocide looms," the petition states.

"If the Holocaust has taught Jews to respond seriously to any threat, than how much more seriously should Israel respond to this threat, given Ahmadinejad's radical theology and his quest for weapons of mass destruction?" Levine wrote in an article titled, "Today's Haman: Adversary and Enemy" in the March issue of BabagaNewz.

"Ahmadinejad is the Haman of our generation, but with God's help, we can stop him. Just as Esther recognized her responsibility and acted against Haman, we must recognize our responsibility and act against Ahmadinejad," he wrote, comparing current events to the story behind Purim, which is just around the corner on March 3.

Levine said that Ahmadinejad's threats defy principles outlined in Chapter 1 of the UN Charter, which states that UN members cannot threaten or use force against another politically independent state, and Article 3 of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, which states that incitement to commit genocide is punishable.

"Our angle is that moving up to Purim, we want kids to understand that we are not just reading a story that Hamans have existed throughout Jewish history and like Esther who didn't stand idly by and took some action, we want our kids to act in a way now that will hopefully prevent any type of genocide in the future," Levine said.

"Our goal is to get 5,000 kids to sign the petition… Actually, our effort is meant to target kids, but it is a global, political effort," he said, adding that he is confident that he will reach his goal of getting 5,000 signatures.

"What we'd love to see is for kids in all the day schools to have a booth at the Megillah reading where the congregants, who drown out the name of Haman inside, will use their pens to drown out Ahmadinejad's anti-Semitism on the outside."

JDSHL tournament a fun-filled affair

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Downsview's Chesswood Arenas were a frenzied hub of adolescent activity last Feb. 9 as the Jewish Day School Hockey League (JDSHL) wrapped up its 2006-07 season with its 12th Annual Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Tournament.

It was a raucous affair.

The complex's four rinks were packed with milling parents and excited, partisan student bodies, all flowing from one grandstand to the next to cheer on their teams.

The JDSHL estimates close to 600 people attended the tournament.

Chants of "Let's go [insert favourite team name here]!" pierced the air, accompanied by fans sounding blow horns as goals were scored, holding up colourful placards and booing rabidly when penalties were called.

The league was launched with one purpose in mind, to foster a spirit of community between students across participating Jewish day schools.

"We shaped a league that is more than just hockey. It has been a social environment where kids could be amongst peers from many schools. We believe it has been an enormous success and we look forward to doing it all over again next year," stated Russell Pritchard and Errol Singer, the league's co-convenors, in the introductory remarks of the JDSHL tournament handbook.

The non-contact league consists of 14 teams, 230 players in all, from five Jewish day schools and their various campuses: Associated Hebrew Schools, Bialik, United Synagogue Day Schools, Leo Baeck and Heschel.

The season began in late November, with weekly games being held in the early mornings, prior to classes and culminated three months later with the memorial tournament.

Pritchard, now in his second year as co-convenor, spent the day furiously alternating between coaching his USDS Bayview Junior team and troubleshooting for the tournament.

"It's gotten easier for me this year because I learned how to organize better than last year," he said, in between helping referees find their rinks and showing delivery people where to put down boxes of tangerines for players to snack on in between games.

Pritchard said he was happy to receive praise afterwards from families who were impressed with the spirit of the games.

In an e-mail sent to the JDSHL, one grandfather, who took the day off to watch his grandson play for Leo Baeck, expressed his gratitude to the league.

Pritchard forwarded the e-mail to the CJN.

"I was overwhelmingly impressed and overjoyed to see our young day school people thoroughly committed and involved in enriching the Canadian spirit of a community living in peace and fulfillment," it read.

"That was the greatest. I'd do this all over again next year just because of that letter," Pritchard said. "It's beautiful to see that this tournament can show how strong the Jewish community is. People say the community is on the decline. It's not. There's strong commitments to being Jewish in this city."

Pritchard's son, Jake, plays forward for his USDS Bayview junior team and commented on his father's coaching abilities after the team's 7-2 morning loss to Associated Kamin.

"He switches me around a lot and we'll win some games, but my other coach is a bit better than my dad," Jake admitted, barely stifling a grin.

The other coach? Retired Toronto Maple Leafs icon, Doug Gilmour, who coaches Jake on his Greater Toronto Hockey League team, the Don Mills Flyers.

In fact, many of the players in the JDSHL also play competitively in outside leagues and often face each other as adversaries in those matches. So it's a treat when they get to play with, instead of against, each other in the JDSHL, said Adam Altberg, whose son Mathew plays goal for the USDS Bayview juniors.

"I tell [Mathew] to have fun," Altberg said. "The JDSHL is all about fun."

In that respect, Pritchard and Singer both consider this JDSHL season a resounding success.

"The kids had the best time," Pritchard said. "After [season games], the kids would go get bagels and chocolate milk together before being carpooled off to school. It's very cute."

This year, the tournament was divided in two, one competition for juniors, grades 3 to 5, and one for seniors grades 6 through 8.

Both juniors and seniors were divided into 'A' and 'B' divisions and played a round-robin of games with two junior and two senior teams crowned champions by day's end.

Leo Baeck North defeated Associated Kamin 3-2 to win the Junior 'A' division. Heschel beat USDS 1-0 to capture the junior 'B' title.

Meanwhile, the Leo Baeck North seniors downed the Associated seniors 11-4 in senior 'A' play, while the Bialik seniors won a five-game series against Leo Baeck South seniors in the senior 'B' grouping.

Inside Back

One step forward, one step back

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

New Views

At the end of January, the Knesset confirmed the appointed of Raleb Majadele, the first Muslim cabinet minister in Israeli political history (Majadele is an Israeli Arab). In his new post as minister without portfolio, Majadele is the most recent example of Israel's progressive politics – with the exception of right-wing heavy Avigdor Lieberman, the minister of strategic affairs, every cabinet minister voted in favour of Majadele's appointment.

Choosing a Muslim minister might simply be a way for Israel's leaders to display their tolerant side, but even so, the move is the exact opposite of the brand of politics practised in most Arab countries. The bizarre relationship between the Neturei Karta sect and Iranian Prime Minister Mahmoud Ahmadinejad aside, surely we will not see a Jew holding any degree of sway in an Arab government any time soon.

U.S. Senator Hillary Clinton recently began an effort to become America's first female president, but in Israel, the door has been wide open to female politicians for half a century. In 1969, Golda Meir became prime minister of Israel, a position she held for five years. At the time, only two other women had held a similarly prominent post anywhere in the world. Today, two women stand at the pinnacle of Israeli politics: Tzipi Livni, the current foreign minister and deputy prime minister, is considered a front-runner to assume the Kadima party's leadership, and Kadima MK Dalia Itzik has taken over as interim president while Moshe Katsav battles serious criminal allegations.

But if Israel's political hierarchy is dependably tolerant, the country's haredim consistently display a vicious affinity for sexism. Virtually all haredi community leaders – all of whom are men, by the way – prefer to keep their women unseen and unheard. Whether it's pouring bleach on females deemed to be dressed inappropriately (a recent trend in both Mea Shearim and Bnei Brak) or limiting the degree to which women can gain a secular education (according to a recent decree in Israel, women can no longer pursue a post-secondary-level degree at the Beit Ya'akov chain of educational institutions for women), the haredim seem determined to marginalize their women in every way possible.

Perhaps the most odious of the haredi policies of sexism is the group's segregated buses, now operational on 30 routes across Israel. On these so-called "mehadrin buses," women are forced to sit at the back of the bus, a la the America South, circa 1950. A Feb. 3 story in the Globe and Mail ("Women taking a stand to sit up front") highlighted the depths to which much of the haredi community has sunk. The article told the story of Miriam Shear, a haredi woman from Toronto who was physically abused while riding a mehadrin bus. Shear chose to sit in the front of one such bus headed to Jerusalem's Old City, but she was confronted by a man who ordered her to relocate to the back. When she refused, the man spit in her face and then, aided by four other haredi men, slapped, beat and kicked her to the ground. No one came to her assistance.

The Israeli Supreme Court's decision to investigate the mehadrin bus situation in the wake of the attack on Shear is certainly a positive step toward preventing some haredim from treating their women like garbage (or punching bags). But the sad fact remains that many haredim appear intent on punishing and abusing their own women at every turn.

Israel has been open to female participation at the highest levels of politics for decades and is consistently tolerant toward even its fiercest enemies. Considering that record of open-mindedness, the practice of brutal sexism among some haredim is a blight that must be eliminated as quickly as possible.

In a country as progressive as Israel, the cave-man attitudes of one group weigh heavily on everyone else. If Israel's progressive image is to be maintained, the sexism within its haredi community must be stopped.

1 loaf sourdough bread, cut into 1/2" cubes
2 small leeks, white portion only, chopped
1 medium sweet red pepper, chopped
1 1/2 c shredded Swiss cheese, divided
1 1/2 c shredded Cheddar cheese, divided
8 eggs
2 c milk
1/2 c beer
2 garlic cloves, minced
1/4 tsp salt
1/4 tsp pepper

In a 13"x 9"x 2" baking dish coated with nonstick cooking spray, layer half of the bread cubes, half of the leeks and half of the red pepper, 3/4 c. Swiss cheese and 3/4 c. cheddar cheese. Repeat layers once.

In a bowl, whisk the eggs, milk, beer, garlic, salt and pepper. Pour over cheese. Cover with plastic wrap. Weigh strata down with a slightly smaller baking dish. Refrigerate for at least 2 hrs. or overnight.

Remove from the refrigerator 30 min. before baking. Bake, uncovered, at 350°F. for 40-45 min. or until center is set. Let stand 5-10 min. before cutting.

Goel Tzedec, known as the University Avenue Synagogue, is shown in these two old postcards. The larger scene shows University Avenue looking north from Queen Street. The synagogue is at the lower right and the provincial legislature building is at the top of the street. The former crown jewel of Toronto's old downtown Jewish community, Goel Tzedec had a lavish interior and a seating capacity of 1,200. It opened in February 1907, exactly 100 years ago this month. In 1955, the congregation merged with the McCaul Street shul and moved uptown to become the Beth Tzedec Congregation, and the old Goel Tzedec was demolished. REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Rebecca seagull

URBAN WRITER

I lost a friend a short while ago. Her name was Rebecca Mamann and she was as beautiful at 80 as a young woman of 20 – and as strong as a redwood in a storm.

On the day Rebecca returned to heaven, I was in Florida. It's painful to go about your business when you know someone whom you loved so deeply is departing our world.

So I decided to go down to the ocean and make my own memorial service for Rebecca. I sat by the edge of the sea until I could do so no longer, because there was a Floridian chill and the waves were agitated. The ocean water was lapping at my shorts and I was forced to retreat a bit further inland.

I wrote her name in the sand – REBECCA – and circled it. I figured once the letters were windswept, no longer legible, my memorial would be complete.

I looked up at the grey bluish clouds and saw pictures scattered throughout the billowing vapours. (When I was a boy, lying in bed, I could see faces – sometimes contorted, other times like Renoir's genteel piano players – in the panelling on my bedroom walls). I could see Rebecca in the clouds.

I saw her in her entirety in a large cloud floating above me. A grey spot dotted the cloud. The dot was her heart. Soon it dissipated. Soon the entire image of Rebecca was gone.

I then saw here as a child in a bluish white cluster of the sky-cotton. What a celebration it must have been when she came into our world. Imagine the dancing and singing in that Moroccan city as Rebecca, the infant, the toddler, the child, stretched and played.

The sand was blowing harder, and the waves swept away one of my sandals. REBECCA was becoming harder to see.

Then a seagull landed an arm's length away from me. I could see Rebecca in its eyes. They were dancing and skipping, just like my friend's.

Much has been said about birds and death. A widow (what a lonely word)… no, make that a woman who had lost her husband told me that a redbird came to visit her every day for a month after her husband died and sat by the window "just like that." She said it was his spirit. One day the redbird didn't show up. The woman said her husband no longer had to watch over her.

I spoke to Rebecca seagull.

I told her I loved her and would miss her. I sobbed but was undaunted by my tears. I used to be. I wished Rebecca well and complimented her for the superlative job she had done in life, giving birth to 11 children – forging ahead bravely after seeing four of them die – and for the joyousness she had, even during the worst of times.

Another seagull came and landed next to Rebecca seagull. I believe it was her late husband, Albert. They flew a short distance and landed. She looked back. I waved and shouted that I was OK and would see her again, one day soon. They flew away.

Two hours had passed and I figured her funeral in Toronto was over. REBECCA in the sand was gone and the seagulls were nowhere to be seen. I looked out at the breaking waves, up to the heavens and then said Kaddish for my friend.

I walked away from my ceremonial circle. I was no longer certain if those moments were real or not, whether pictures in the clouds had really projected Rebecca, or if I had detected my friend's spirit within the seagull. I just wasn't sure.

Goodbye for now Rebecca. You did well. Until we meet again.

King Solomon's takes the decisions out of decision-making

Large and elaborate, or small and intimate? Italian cuisine, or Middle Eastern? Afternoon or evening?

Planning a special event generally means making a number of difficult choices, but with King Solomon's, the choice of venue doesn't have to be one of them.

As one of Canada's largest and finest Glatt Kosher restaurants — King Solomon's Table — we can comfortably accommodate up to 350 guests on our elegant premises.

As one of its premier Glatt Kosher Caterers — King Solomon's Catering — we can cater events of any size at a venue of your choice, as well as smaller functions at your home or office.

Either way, our unparalleled Glatt Kosher cuisine is yours to enjoy, when you want it, where you want it. We remove the biggest decision from your decision-making process.

We doubt even your shrink can do that for you. If he can, we want his number.

Most venues claim the sky's the limit; at the Granite Club, it's just a good start

Admit it. At least once in your life, you've wished you had a private chef. You've fancied how wonderful it would be to have exquisite meals prepared to your liking, without having to lift a finger. And a kitchen staff to whisk away the dishes, course by delicious course.

Now that "never in my wildest imagination" has morphed into "I can't believe this is actually happening," there's no point stopping with the main meal. For dessert, why not have a full-time Pastry Chef (Parisian-trained, bien sur) at your disposal, then request a creation decadent enough to give Louis XIV pause. A Mille Feuilles cake, perhaps? One with the prerequisite thousand sheets of pastry — no more no less — which you'll count as you work your way through them, one by delicious one?

Let's face it. Playing King and Queen every day would get boring, but on a handful of milestone occasions in life, it sure beats playing us. And what better gift to bestow on our loved ones than the opportunity to enjoy the royal treatment? The guilty pleasure of our own self-indulgence is quickly transformed into the pure pleasure of showing our family and friends just how much we care.

Enter the Granite Club. From the lush grounds — some 22 acres which were recently certified as part of the Audubon Cooperative Sanctuary Program — to the art-lined, history-steeped corridors and dining rooms — this is a castle with everything but the moat. In the palatial kitchens, true to your fantasy, a small army of distinguished chefs awaits your royal bidding. It's a one-of-a-kind venue for your once-in-a-lifetime event.

Ironically, however, the best part of hosting your event at the Granite Club isn't the opportunity to dine in regal splendour.

It isn't the grand ballroom so spacious that, if you've got enough family and friends to fill it to capacity, you are truly blessed.

It isn't the greenery that extends from the surrounding ravine to the beautifully landscaped terraces, nor the floral arrangements that would be the envy of some botanical gardens. (No need to go to nature here; nature comes to you).

It isn't even the Victorian-style Brides room, nor is it the valet parking.

It is none of the above. Rather, it is the ability to have all of these amenities presented, planned, and delivered not only with consummate professionalism, but with the kind of old-school, down-to-earth service you'd expect from a friendly neighbourhood boutique.

Too good to be true? Those who've hosted their events at the Granite Club beg to differ, as do their next of kin. Here, the Bat Mitzvah girl of today is the bride of tomorrow, and so it goes, from generation to generation. The Granite Club spells t-r-a-d-i-t-i-o-n. (Of course, a little $3 million renovation never hurts; even historical sites need state-of-the-art accoutrements). Thankfully, the upgrades blend in with, rather than overshadow, the Granite's bygone-era elegance. Says Director Of Catering Deborah Muise, "We're fortunate to have all the elements in place here that people want for their simchas. The facilities speak for themselves. We don't need to pitch them, or rant about how we'll go all out to serve you. That's a given."

You may not need a sales pitch when planning your event, but you do need the kind of expertise and meticulous planning that puts you in the comfort zone of knowing everything will go smoothly — not hoping and praying it does. Muise, executive chef Nigel Didcock, and the entire staff of the Granite Club — some 200 strong — focus all their energies towards putting you in that zone and keeping you there.

Traditionally private, for special events the Granite Club welcomes the community and members alike. Those who avail themselves of it for their simchas enjoy a richly rewarding experience. Most venues claim the sky's the limit; here, it's just a good start. Visit their website at www.graniteclub.com.

Happy Purim!

The holiday of Purim, more tangibly and more vividly than all of the other holidays on our calendar, makes real the duality of Jewish existence and history: survival and celebration.

During Purim we skimp on neither portion.

The story as told in the Scroll of Esther, which we are required to hear, is quite explicit in describing the anti-Jewish aim and obsession of the villain.

"And the letters were sent by courier to all the king's provinces, instructing to annihilate, to kill and to destroy all the Jews, the young and the elderly, children and women… and to take their property for plunder."

The peril to the Jews was beyond overstatement.

by Devorah Lindsay
Grade 6

But equally explicit in the story was the requirement to celebrate.

"They should keep these days… as days… as a month which was transformed for them from sorrow to gladness and from mourning to holiday and to make them days of feasting and gladness and for sending foods to one another and for giving gifts to the poor."

Just as we have ensured, over the many years and generations, that our children should know the story of the full peril, so too have we ensured that they should know and see and feel the happiness and release of full "gladness" and merriment.

Editorial

In her double-mask drawing, sixth-grader Devorah Lindsay succinctly captures the duality of Jewish history. And second-grader Eitan Karakowsky innocently expresses, through the bold colours and distinct lines of his imagination, the uncluttered feelings of full celebration.

They are feelings that are especially welcome and perhaps especially needed these days. For long and deeply embedded are the lines of worry that crease the collective Jewish brow today.

Last year at this time, on this page and in this editorial, we wrote: "It is an eerie irony… engendering new fears for our future, that the modern-day descendant of the villain Haman, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, repeatedly, noisily, pathologically seeks to destroy the Jews."

Alas, in the intervening 12 months, Ahmadinejad has not changed, except perhaps, for the worse. The Iranian president still seeks to destroy the Jews. But he and his regime have become far more aggressive in funding, training, encouraging and supporting terror against the Jewish people and colluding with enemies of Israel wherever they can be found.

The News in Brief

CANADA

CJC Meets MacKay

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress met with Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay last week to discuss CJC initiatives on the genocide in Sudan's Darfur region. Jonathan Laski, of STAND (Students Taking Action Now: Darfur) Canada, also took part.

Senator to Retire

OTTAWA — B.C. Senator Jack Austin is retiring March 2, on his 75th birthday. He was honoured by his Senate colleagues last week. Appointed in 1975 by then-prime minister Pierre Trudeau, the Calgary-born Austin served in cabinet twice and was leader of the government in the Senate under former prime minister Paul Martin.

App'ts Announced

OTTAWA — Five Jews – former Ontario cabinet minister Chaviva Hosek, film director Arthur Hiller, Edmonton biochemist Cyril Kay and engineer Jacob Masliyah, and Montreal bodybuilding legend Ben Weider – are among 29 people who have been named officers of the Order of Canada, the governor general's office said last week. New Jewish members of the order are Toronto mystery writer Howard Engel, Montreal businessman Avrum Morrow and University of Manitoba professor Evelyn Shapiro.

WORLD

Papon Dies

PARIS — French Nazi collaborator Maurice Papon died Feb. 17 in Paris at 96 due to complications from heart surgery. Papon worked with German occupation forces in wartime France and oversaw the deportation of at least 1,500 French Jews to Nazi death camps. He evaded the postwar purge of collaborators and rose through French politics to become a cabinet minister in 1978. His wartime past was later exposed, and in 1998, he was sentenced to 10 years in jail for crimes against humanity. He fled to Switzerland but was extradited to France, where he was jailed in 1999. He won early release for health reasons.

Teen Sentenced

LONDON — A teenage girl who attacked a 12-year-old Jewish girl on a London bus last year was found guilty of robbery and attempted robbery. The attacker, 14, was sentenced to 10 months in detention and training, but the judge said she likely will serve half the term. The 14-year-old and a friend stole the victim's bracelet and attacked her, leaving her unconscious, after asking her if she was "Jewish or English." The court ruled there was not enough evidence to consider the case racially motivated.

Brothers Attacked

LONDON — Two Jewish brothers were attacked by three youths in London's Golders Green neighbourhood. As the brothers, 25 and 35, left a restaurant in the largely Jewish neighbourhood Feb. 15, the three youths yelled, "F---ing Jews!" and gave chase, wielding sticks, rocks and a baseball bat. The brothers sustained injuries including cuts to the face and arms, severe bruising and swollen lips before the assailants fled. Police called the incident a "racially motivated attack causing actual bodily harm," and appealed for help in finding the three attackers, described by witnesses as about 17 and of white, Arab/Muslim and Mediterranean backgrounds.

Bris Death Probed

LONDON — London police are investigating the death of an infant who went into cardiac arrest 15 minutes after his circumcision in a north London synagogue Feb. 1. Eight-day-old Amitai Moshe went into cardiac arrest after a mohel performed the circumcision, and he died more than a week later. The cause of death has not been confirmed. Police are treating it as unexplained. The Board of Deputies of British Jews said no link has been established between the circumcision and Amitai's death.

Suspect Arrested In Attack on Nobel Laureate

NEW YORK — New Jersey police arrested a suspect in a hate-crime assault on Elie Wiesel.

Elie Wiesel

Police in Montgomery Township, N.J., said Feb. 17 that Eric Hunt, 22, was taken into custody without incident in connection with the Feb. 1 attack on the Nobel laureate and Holocaust survivor.

Hunt was arrested at the Carrier Clinic, a psychiatric and addiction treatment centre. A judge denied him bail and his lawyer's request to move him to a psychiatric facility.

Wiesel, 78, was accosted as he attended an interfaith forum in San Francisco by a man who apparently wanted to force him to recant his wartime memoir Night.

A claim of responsibility on an anti-Semitic website identified the assailant as Hunt. He faces charges in California, including attempted kidnapping, stalking, battery and committing a hate crime.

High schoolers to help clean up New Orleans

BBYO, USY teens head south

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Sometimes the fire of tikkun olam burns so strong, not even a hurricane can blow it out.

And for 35 Toronto- and Ottawa-area high school students, aged 14 to 18, and their youth leaders and chaperones, a hurricane is exactly what they're about to confront.

From March 11 to 14, members of the Toronto B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) and United Synagogue Youth (USY) will volunteer in the New Orleans area, helping with property reclamation projects and restoring hope to people affected by Hurricane Katrina.

A joint initiative of the USY and BBYO, the volunteer mission, titled "Rebuild Homes, Rebuild Lives," will proceed under the guidance of the Michigan-based, non-profit National Relief Network (NRN), an organization dedicated to leading and facilitating student volunteer efforts in American disaster zones.

Ariel Greenbaum-Shinder, 24, regional director of youth activities for USY, expects that the trip will be emotional for everyone involved.

Ryan Bernknopf and Missy Korn

To prepare, two orientations for participants and their parents were held to educate them about the history of Katrina, to reassure parents that all precautions are being taken to provide security to the students, and to "hammer home" that this will not be a fun-and-games trip, Greenbaum-Shinder said.

USY staff also created an information handbook for participants to consult while in the Big Easy.

Its introductory remarks sound a note of caution for those embarking on this tikkun olam journey.

"The things you will see in the days to come will be difficult, to say the least. It is no easy task to see a community that was once alive and thriving, now completely destroyed, and with little life in it," the booklet warns.

The USY handbook also lists the following sobering facts about Katrina's legacy in the state: the official death toll in Louisiana is 976; missing persons number 2,500; and the federally declared disaster area encompasses 90,000 square miles.

According to Greenbaum-Shinder and Missy Korn, 24, program director for BBYO, everyone is up to the challenge ahead of them.

They added that both their organizations are eager to meet with their New Orleans chapters, which are still "getting back on their feet" after the disaster.

Both Korn and Greenbaum-Shinder believe the Canadians will come back with a renewed sense of chesed.

"It'll be a life-changing experience for our kids," Korn predicted.

Heroism, community, dignity

From the editor's desk

Every nation has its history; every history, its legends and heroes. Israel, as we know, has many heroes. Alas, it has needed them because of the countless battlefield and other sacrifices its sons and daughters have been called upon to make since the country's very beginning, to ensure its survival.

But there are forms of heroism other than the brave acts of character that divide life from death, that are so vital to the spirit and well-being of society. This is the heroism of everyday kindness, caring and giving when, among those heroes, there is so little to give and so many ready reasons neither to be kind nor caring. It is the "smaller" heroism of ordinary people who together decide to build something for others, even as they build for themselves.

Such is the heroism made possible in pockets of different neighbourhoods throughout Jerusalem by the Jerusalem Foundation, as it strives to enable ordinary individuals to build the diverse communities in which they live.

In this fifth instalment in the series of articles describing the work of the Jerusalem Foundation, I write briefly of one such community building project: the International Cultural Centre for Youth (ICCY).

In the south central part of Jerusalem, at the hilly crossings of neighbourhoods where the names of the streets – Derech Chevron (the way to Hebron), or Rachel Emainu (our mother Rachel) – evoke images of ancient, dusty roadways travelled long and hard by dwellers in or near the vicinity of Jerusalem is a street called Emek Refa'im (the valley of ghosts).

More than a street, it is now its own geographical marker, a pleasant, upscale commercial thoroughfare of trendy shops, cafés and restaurants at the centre of the neighbourhood, more formally known as Hamoshava Germanit, the German Colony. A few steps down from the sidewalk on Emek Refa'im, walking west not long past the intersection with David Hamelech (King David), is the ICCY. But "cultural" is too narrow an adjective for the myriad activities in the building.

The centre hums and vibrates with activity the entire day. Its 20 staff members serve thousands of people from all ages, stages, walks of life, economic, ethnic and religious backgrounds. The place is full of people every day, the entire day, starting at 8:00 a.m. local time.

Shayke El Ami, the centre's executive director, points to the auditorium and says with considerable pride that "it is probably the busiest auditorium in all of Jerusalem."

Dancing, drama, debating, poetry-reading, arts, crafts, cultural displays and worship all have their place regularly in the building and in the auditorium. Indeed, the auditorium is the home of the popular modern Orthodox minyan Shira Chadasha (a new song). Some 350 worshippers attend services there each Shabbat. The centre has also recently become the home of the community council, Ginot Ha'ir (the city gardens), which functions much like a local ratepayers association in Canada, and serves residents from neighbourhoods well beyond the boundaries of the German Colony.

El Ami nearly flamed with emotion as he talked about the place, its many activities and the key role it plays in the lives of the people who meet there. Through the example of the centre and the life that pulsates within, he and his staff are trying to build a vibrant, tolerant, pluralistic future for Jerusalem and all its neighbourhoods.

Some of the innovative programming at the centre falls within the category of gishur, bridge-building, within and across different social groupings and social gaps. At first an attempt to bridge gaps between observant and non-observant, the concept has broadened. It might also be singles seeking each other or troubled youngsters seeking dialogue and help in solving problems.

One of the key mechanisms through which many of the programs works is the idea of a "time bank." "Give an hour and get an hour" is how it is described in capsule form. But the concept, which has been adopted throughout community centres in Jerusalem, has a deeply philosophical and highly purposeful underpinning.

The time bank aims to build community resilience and solidarity by creating an alternative economy in which time, of which everyone has some, and not money, of which many people in Jerusalem have very little, is the means of exchange.

Give an hour; get an hour.

The benefit to the individual is at many levels. He or she receives a service or participates in a program and, at the same time, is enriched by the dignity-enhancing self-satisfaction of having given, too.

Unfortunately, the building, much like the improbable shoe in which the nursery rhyme's old woman and her many children lived, is today ill-suited, ill-equipped and vastly too small for the countless thousands who use it and rely on it. It needs to be repaired, remodelled and renewed.

Thanks to the generosity of the Koschitzky family of Toronto, and to their commitment to pluralism and the enhancement of human dignity, it will be.

Soon, a sparkling, newly renovated centre will arise to help sustain and protect the energy, mutual respect and tolerance of the neighbourhood along Emek Refa'im.

We celebrate this heroism, too. Just possibly, it will help inspire the building of similar neighbourhoods throughout Jerusalem.

Israel's Regev sees shift among moderate Arabs

Formal diplomatic relations, informal meetings cited

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

If it's Israel, there must be a crisis.

The spokesperson for Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs did not use precisely those words, but as Mark Regev explained last week, "2006 was not an easy year."

There was the war in Lebanon, the continuing conflict in Gaza, "and too many lives were lost," both Jewish and Arab, he said.

"Sometimes people can become despondent and lose hope whether we'll have peace and quiet."

But, adding a note of optimism, Regev said a "cool analysis" suggests that the tide may be turning.

Ultimately, he said, "more and more Palestinians are going to understand the extremists promise blood" and a political dead end. "They can't bring anything tangible to the Palestinian people."

Regev was in Toronto last week for a series of speaking engagements in the Jewish community and to meet with Canadian media. The Australian-born Regev made the case for the Palestinians to join the moderate Arab camp, which includes Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, the government of Lebanon and the Fatah leadership.

"What the moderates offer is tangible support, international recognition and an energized peace process," he stated.

His analysis came as U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visited the region and met with Israeli and Palestinian leaders. Her visit came after leaders of Fatah and Hamas returned from Mecca and announced a new Palestinian unity government designed to end internecine Palestinian violence.

Israel, however, announced that it would not deal with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas on larger peace issues if he formed the coalition government with Hamas.

Regev said the Palestinians "have to make their own choices. They have to choose between the path articulated by [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad or the path articulated by [former Egyptian president] Anwar Sadat."

If they choose Ahmadinejad's path, violence will increase, but if they follow the late Egyptian's path, the door can open to the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan, which ends in Palestinian statehood, he said.

Regev suggested that a shift is occurring in the Arab and Muslim world, one that is moving moderate regimes closer to Israel.

Mark Regev

In addition to the formal diplomatic relations that Israel maintains with Egypt, Jordan and Mauritania, Israel holds open and informal meetings with Oman, Qatar, Morocco and Tunisia, and discrete under-the-radar talks with "a third group."

He sidestepped a question about whether news reports of a Saudi prince considering a hotel project in Tel Aviv were accurate, saying only that regional concerns about Iranian ambitions are creating an opening for Israel.

Regev said that Iran's "Shiite revolution is a threat to all [its] neighbours... Many countries see a threat to their stability as Iran in the east and not Israel in the west. So, we are seeing countries that in the past did not have a dialogue with Israel opening a dialogue with Israel."

Israel now has an opportunity to engage with that "pragmatic impulse in the Arab world," he said.

Turning to Canada's role in the Middle East, Regev said "the Canadian government is seen as being friendly. Canada has always been perceived as a friend of Israel, and we saw that specifically in the last two years."

Canada's historic support for moderates among the Palestinians and against the extremists "is not being pro-Israel," he said. "That's being pro-peace."

Referring to past Israeli policy of closing several West Bank settlements, Regev said that one or two years ago, Israel intended to "pull out, lock the gate and if they chose peace, fine."

If the Palestinians chose to continue the conflict, Israel's plan was to simply disengage, he said.

"Rockets from Gaza show that is not feasible," he added.

Peace will only come if Palestinian moderates neutralize terrorists and negotiate with Israel, he said.

Regev said he is confident that European nations and the United States will not suspend the three benchmarks they have demanded of the Palestinian government: recognition of Israel, compliance with past agreements and an end to violence.

"They are the basis for progress," he said. "There is no other way forward."

'Paper Clips' organizer speaks to Toronto teens

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Ronny Carr was in Toronto last week to speak to children about his involvement with the Paper Clip Project and the importance of overcoming intolerance.

Carr, a Whitwell Middle School senior from Whitwell, Tenn., – a small southern town with a population of about 1,600 – spoke to teens at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue on Feb. 17 about his personal involvement in creating a project to raise awareness about the Holocaust.

The Paper Clips Project, which has garnered international attention, is an after-school program that was initiated in 1998 by Linda Hooper, the school's principal, to help students better understand the extent of the genocide.

Students set out to collect a paper clip for each of the six million Jewish Holocaust victims.

Once the media got wind of the project, millions upon millions of paper clips poured into Whitwell – a town without a single Jewish family – and even inspired the award-winning documentary Paper Clips, filmed in 2004.

Carr's lecture was the first of a four-part Shabbat speaker series called From Darkness to Light meant to "recapture teenage involvement in synagogue life, focus on lessons learned from the Holocaust, and the idea of showing Jewish renewal and inspiration," said Rabbi David Bauman, the event's organizer.

"I'll be giving them a sense of my personal involvement with the project and what I gained from the project," said Carr, 18, just hours after landing in Toronto, a day before he delivered his lecture.

He said that when he became involved with the project in Grade 8, he had no idea what to expect.

"When you actually get to learn in depth about what happened, it hits you like, whoa, I can't believe something like this happened. It was a shock to hear and see what actually did take place, instead of just reading one paragraph in a world history book. It was really shocking," he said.

To date, more than 30 million paper clips have been sent to Whitwell Middle School and a memorial has been created to exhibit the paper clips with the help of Peter and Dagmar Schroeder, White House correspondents for German newspapers.

When they heard about the initiative, they tracked down and purchased a rail car used to transport Jews to death camps, and brought it to Whitwell.

Inside the rail car, there are 11 million paper clips, one for each of the Jewish, Roma, homosexual, and other Holocaust victims, as well as letters, pictures and more, Carr said, adding that one aspect of the Paper Clip Project is to conduct tours of the rail car to teach others about the Holocaust.

He said that while there are other groups around the world also working to create tolerance and raise awareness, he thinks the reason the international community has reacted so positively to this is because it came out of a such a small town.

"When I go speak to these different groups, when they see what our community did – coming from a community where everyone is basically the same – for them to see that a group of students in eighth grade in a middle school in Whitwell, Tenn., can make such a big difference, it really lets you see what [can be] done," Carr said.

"It wasn't about making a movie or making everyone see Whitwell, it was just about making a difference and teaching the students about tolerance."

He said that the filmmakers who made Paper Clips are in the process of filming a followup about the international reaction to the first film.

"It's great to see non-Jews who are trying to learn their own lessons and then end up having such an influence and an inspirational story," Rabbi Bauman said, adding that next summer, there will be a teen bus tour travelling to Washington D.C., to see the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, to Whitwell, Tenn., to see the Paper Clips exhibit and to New York to see the Museum of Jewish Heritage.

A March of the Living participant, a panel of Holocaust survivors and a speaker from Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee will also speak as part of the speaker series within the next few weeks.

JACS starts pre-teen drug intervention program

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

JACS Toronto has launched an addiction counselling program aimed at children ages 10 to 13.

Zalman Goldman, managing director of JACS (Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others), said the pilot pre-teen intervention program is focusing on kids who are living in a home where parents or older siblings are involved with drugs.

"These pre-teens are at a high risk of becoming substance dependent, with many reporting that they are regularly experimenting with drugs and alcohol," Goldman said.

Addiction and alcoholism is commonly transmitted generationally from parent to child, he said, and children as young as nine can start experimenting with drugs and alcohol by mimicking the behaviour of their addicted parents or siblings.

The pre-teen intervention program consists of weekly group meetings facilitated by Steve Rivers, a psychologist who specializes in addiction.

He'll also provide one-on-one counselling to assess the specific needs of each pre-teen and work with outside agencies to ensure the children are in a safe environment and have access to all resources available to them, Goldman said.

JACS needs to get to these kids early in order to stem the tide, he said. "Some of them are 11 years old and are [acting as] the mother or father of the house because [one or both of their parents] is an alcoholic. It is a tremendous pressure on them. Kids need to be kids."

Goldman said he knows of 11 pre-teens that need the program, and he's reaching out to professionals and to the community to let them know it exists. "We've noticed that families with issues have kids who experiment at a younger age. We see this time and time again."

JACS' program for older teens ages 13 to 19, launched about 1½ years ago, is named for Benji Hayward, the 14-year old who drowned in Lake Ontario more than 18 years ago after trying LSD.

"Some of these kids are in high-risk circles, or have parents or siblings who are addicts," Goldman said.

The program also deals with "attention seeking" behaviours such as gambling or acting out sexually, said Goldman.

Since its inception, more than 300 adolescents have attended the Benji Hayward Teen Program, he said.

> 'We've noticed that families with issues have kids who experiment at a younger age'
> — Zalman Goldman

"Participating teens come to relate to issues on their own terms, without judgment or embarrassment. When an 18-year-old walks into a room with other 18-year-olds, they can identify.

"They are also introduced to constructive life coping skills and tools to help them make healthy and confident decisions.

"For teens who think they've crossed the line with drugs and alcohol, program co-ordinators can facilitate the resources they need for recovery."

Those committed to changing their life can take part in a leadership program and learn to mentor youth just entering a program, he said.

"These kids have succeeded in transitioning from a life of drugs, and now they're giving back to other kids. They are becoming role models."

Recently, Goldman said, someone celebrated their one-year milestone. "By seeing this, others became motivated to get there as well."

Now that JACS is expanding its Sheppard Avenue West location, it has room to facilitate more meetings, he said.

"When we started five years ago, we had a crisis phone line, and we ran one meeting. Now we get 200 calls a month, more than 1,000 hits on our website, and will soon have 14 weekly meetings."

An open forum that runs every Thursday gives people a good introduction to JACS and its services, Goldman said.

He has given talks at Jewish Family & Child Service and at the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health (CAMH), and JACS is a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto agency.

"Five years ago, we knew it would be an uphill battle. We are grateful to the community that put its trust in us."

As far as addictions go, "the Jewish community is no different than any other. We know that there are Jewish teens from every school and from every segment of the community that get together every week to drink and take drugs," Goldman said.

"The reality is that we get calls from all over. The community has an issue, and we are here to provide a safe place for kids and adults. No family and no circle is immune."

The JACS Battle of the Bands, the agency's major annual fundraiser, is taking place again this spring. Those interested can contact Nicole at 416-638-9537.

A sense of gladness and gratitude

To the frightening worry over Iran we can add our concern over the rise of fundamentalist Islamic-inspired anti-Semitism in much of Europe and wider reaches; the unremitting hostility of the radicalized, Hamas-influenced younger generation of Palestinians; the distressing incidents of corruption that have afflicted Israeli public life; and the ever-present anxiety over Jewish continuity and sheer demographic regeneration.

The list of frightful worries could be even longer. We could indeed feel constantly bleak and perennially glum.

But that has never been the our way. Nor has it ever been the way that our sages have urged.

They have taught us to "serve God with a sense of happiness." This is precisely the formula that young Eitan has prescribed for us in his drawing: Purim Samayach. Happy Purim. Despite the dark feelings of our times, we are obliged to feel a sense of gladness and the larger gratitude that underlies it.

"Serving God" – in the wide expanse of the broad meaning of that phrase – is at the very core of our purpose as human beings. It is the reason that we are here. We are here for each other. Plain and simple. We are here to help other human beings, to help build a better world.

We are here to help bring out the holiness in the world by finding the holiness within ourselves. It is a beautiful, lifelong assignment that could be as fulfilling each day as it is exciting each day.

To be sure, there is a great deal for which we as individuals and as a people must be worried and against which we must stand on guard.

But if we impart to our children primarily a sense of foreboding and resentment about the world in general and about the Jewish world in particular, then we impart to them a false sense of the place God created. Worse, we impart to them primarily a lesser Judaism, a frightening, alienating sense of Jewish life and virtually no chance to experience the rich, rewarding possibilities of who we are and what we are intended to be.

In a recent essay in the New York Jewish Week, its publisher and editor Gary Rosenblatt, reflecting on the crises of modern Jewish life, warned, "Let's not become so obsessed with our declining numbers – [and other worries such as Iran's existential threat and the unleashing of anti-Semitism] – that we fail to instil Jewish life with creativity, confidence and faith."

Rosenblatt's observation should serve as a clarion to us all.

Jewish life must be more than the enumeration of our fears, however legitimate and real those fears are. It must be stronger than our fears. It must be the wilful engagement of our traditions and teachings in a manner that calls upon and instils ever deeper into their souls the best qualities and highest aspirations of the next generation.

It must be a celebration of a total way of life.

And let it begin with the celebration of Purim.

Israel was considering a major military offensive against the PLO in southern Lebanon. Israel charged that the Palestinians repeatedly broke a ceasefire, stockpiled artillery near the Israel-Lebanon border, and sent guerillas into Israel via Syria and Jordan.

School funding issue is about exclusion

Contrary to what was written in "Tories, faith groups demand an end to government's discriminatory school funding" (CJN, Feb. 22), the United Nations tribunal did not hold that Catholic school funding is discriminatory or wrong in itself, but rather that if schools of one religion are funded, others must be funded also.

While we greatly appreciate the helpfulness of Progressive Conservative MPP Frank Klees and members of the PC caucus in arranging for tabling the "Petition to the Ontario Legislature to Eliminate Discrimination in Faith-based School Funding," we would like to clarify that this petition was written and promoted by Parents for Equality in Education Funding in co-operation with other affected faith communities and organizations. A number of Liberal MPPs also tabled this petition on behalf of large numbers of constituents across the province. Eliminating official religious discrimination is a value that members of all parties can embrace.

The government's response that it has "no intention of funding private religious schools" fails to address the point. Like the proposals of the Canadian Jewish Congress and the Multi-Faith Coalition, we agree that the discrimination can be addressed by allowing non-Catholic faith-based schools to become part of the sphere of publicly funded and regulated education. These schools are only "private" now since they are excluded due to their religion.

NIF answers Steinberg

Despite Gerald Steinberg's criticism of the New Israel Fund (NIF), which is, in fact, an important funder of Israel's civil society, we actually agree that an infusion of the prophetic tradition is desperately needed (How the Diaspora can help fix Israel, CJN, Feb. 8). We are equally concerned about the ethical lapses, personal and political, demonstrated by Israel's leaders, and we are fully in agreement with his call for a "a school curriculum that teaches civic values and responsibilities instead of highlighting narrow ideologies" and "new institutions, based on transparency, due process and mutual respect."

The fact Steinberg dismisses an important aspect of Israel's living up to the ideals of both democracy and prophetic Judaism, the relationship of Israeli Arabs and Jews, as an aging-hippie projection of American Jews' involvement in the Civil Rights era is odd, to say the least. Diaspora Jews who support the New Israel Fund and like-minded organizations that demonstrate their commitment to a truly democratic Israel fund the Israeli Arab sector because they know their values transcend the situational differences between Israel and its fellow democratic states.

We certainly understand that Israel is not a clone of Canada or the United States. Beginning with the central if challenging fact that the state was founded as a homeland for one ethnic group, the state must continually find its way in being both Jewish and democratic, which in no way mitigates the critically important issue of minority civil rights. Facilitating serious dialogue with an often discriminated against, indigenous minority is absolutely critical to the security of Israel, whether or not we like the viewpoints represented in the process.

As Steinberg and others look for new leaders in Israel, those new leaders are developing right in front of them. Civil society is spawning today's activists, who will be tomorrow's Knesset members. They are in the forefront of the fight against corruption and discrimination. As many Israelis saw in the Against All Odds series that aired last year on Channel 2, (viewable in the "In Depth" section at the NIF website www.nif.org), every segment of Israeli society is gathering power through their organizations – organizations that are seeding tomorrow's leadership.

Like Steinberg, we are not cultural relativists, and we firmly believe that there are no special exceptions for the Israeli government as a democratically elected and accountable group of politicians. Both Israelis and Diaspora Jews must support the goal of an ethical and just Israel – the Israel we all know to be possible.

Toronto had the 'finest Yiddish theatre'

I am honoured to be a member of the Ontario Jewish Heritage Committee. This year, Heritage Toronto supports a new initiative involving the "plaquing" of historic Jewish places. Hopefully, one such location will be the Standard Theatre, founded in 1921 at the centre of Toronto Jewry's cultural life, Spadina Avenue and Dundas Street. The most prominent Yiddish arts from New York and Europe performed before us.

I was saddened to read Sol Littman's comment that the productions were "usually tear-jerking melodramas" – occasionally, maybe ("Former Yiddish theatre may become heritage site," CJN, Feb. 15). His remark negates the power and impact of gems such as Sholem Asch's Uncle Moses, Perez Hirsbein's Grine Felder and Szymon Anskey's The Dybbuk, to name but a few shows that thrilled the many patrons.

Those who remember historian Hye Bossin know that "a dash of hyperbole" (the writer's comment) was not Bossin's style. He knew the truth. It was the finest Yiddish theatre anywhere.

Perfection's paradox

Isn't life about striving for perfection? We all dream of the perfect spouse, the perfect job, the perfect home. Perfection is the stuff dreams are made of.

Striving for perfection is natural. We are instinctively driven to fulfil our ambitions. But perfection is extremely uncommon. Something always goes wrong. Even small mistakes can make people obsess about perfection. In the process, our desire for excellence morphs into perfectionism.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Unfortunately, perfectionism is a corrosive force. It destroys relationships. Parents of prodigies can push their children to burnout and depression. "Bridezillas" – brides obsessed with making the perfect wedding – will often achieve flawless, but joyless, wedding ceremonies.

Perfectionism is a bad mix with human frailty. It's also the ugly side of idealism. Communism aspired to create a perfect society where everything is shared and all men are equal. Instead, it created a totalitarian nightmare, where all men were equally enslaved. Cults promise a perfect world, if one is willing to follow a strenuous regimen. In actuality, by demanding perfectionism, these cults brainwash their followers by ensnaring them in a web of guilt. Mass movements that demand universal perfection usually end up wreaking havoc.

Paradoxically, perfectionism is an obstacle on the road to perfection. On the other hand, the road to perfection is usually found through imperfect means. Maimonides notes that even the Torah will adopt flawed ancient institutions in order to achieve progress. This practical search for attainable growth underlies a great deal of Halachah, where there are at times different requirements depending on the situation. In an imperfect world, perfection is sometimes best found by making compromises.

It's easy for us to get overwhelmed by perfectionism, obsessed by perfect dreams about what we really should achieve. That is why one must remember Rabbi Tarfon's admonition that "it is not your responsibility to finish the task, but you are not free to give up on it, either." In life, we have enormous responsibilities. Each of us has to transform the world. Yet at the same time, we can't allow ourselves to be overwhelmed by these responsibilities. Perfectionism is the pursuit of impossible dreams. True human perfection is the patient and capable management of imperfection. This is perfection's paradox.

Failure is the best test of true perfection. After a defeat, perfectionists will quit, paralyzed by evidence of their own imperfection. Only those willing to embrace their imperfection have the flexibility to progress after a painful setback.

There's an Alcoholics Anonymous slogan that counsels "progress, not perfection." This critical reminder cautions recovering addicts not to quit recovery after a relapse. But it's also a reminder to all of us who are overwhelmed by the demands of life that we don't have to finish the task, all we have to do is make progress.

Emboldening the anti-Semites

A paradox confounded the 180 activists and intellectuals gathered in Jerusalem in mid-February for the Israeli Foreign Ministry's Global Forum Against Anti-Semitism. As historian Robert Wistrich noted, anti-Semitism has never been so illegitimate – broadly denounced by international bodies – while also being so ubiquitous and menacing.

Not since the Holocaust have so many Jews felt so much fear for their survival. Iran combines its nuclear ambitions with genocidal threats against the Jewish state. Palestinian terrorists delight in murdering Jews at seders, bar mitzvahs and synagogues. Ancient libels about Jewish influence-peddling resurrected in the Arab press and jihadist sermons become mainstreamed, more subtly, in the western media and among some academics.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Tragically, an intellectual dust-up about whether vehement anti-Zionism feeds anti-Semitism has sidetracked the important fight against Islamist anti-Semitism.

An American Jewish Committee (AJC) pamphlet written by Prof. Alvin Rosenfeld has been denounced for "target[ting] liberal Jews." While accusing Rosenfeld of distorting their words, many critics have distorted his argument. They claim he called all critics of Israel "anti-Semites" when his essay explores which criticisms cross a red line – and why. The AJC – and by extension the American Jewish community – has been accused of being monolithic and "silencing" critics, when the condemnations of Israel and Rosenfeld's essay illustrate the community's diversity. The critics' disproportionate fury at the AJC, despite its silence in the face of Islamist hatred, is the latest chapter in a modern Trahison Des Clercs (Treason of the Intellectuals), that MP Irwin Cotler denounced in a rousing speech to end the forum.

Just before Cotler's address, Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni reaffirmed her country's commitment to self-critical democratic debate even while fighting anti-Semitism. Israel's own, vicious, internal critics prove Israel's democratic vigour. Just days after Livni's speech, an Israeli Arab MK came to Montreal for "Israel Apartheid Week." His speech, "Debunking the Myth of Israeli Democracy," failed to acknowledge that his status as a Knesset member free to libel his country debunked his debunking.

To illustrate the virulence of today's anti-Semitism, Livni read from a document that sounds medieval or Nazi but was written in 1988: "With their money, they took control of the world media, news agencies, the press, publishing houses, broadcasting stations, and others… They were behind the French Revolution, the Communist revolution… They were behind World War I… They were behind World War II… There is no war going on anywhere, without having their finger in it." The "they" referred to by Article 22 of the Hamas Charter is, of course, "the Jews." In Article 7, in calling for Jihad, the charter quotes "The prophet" saying "Muslims will fight the Jews (and kill them)." Given Hamas' track record of killing Jews and killing rival Palestinians, encouraging these deadly delusions is criminally negligent.

Intellectuals who fail to oppose Islamist bigotry – and often perpetuate it by legitimizing it, even if unintentionally – are indeed part of the problem. Their attacks are also counterproductive. Anyone who seeks calm in the region has to recognize that slandering Israel only makes peace even more elusive. Before you can have stability, let alone compromise, you need trust. It's hard to trust when you are being charged with the most heinous of crimes and your enemies demand your destruction.

This problem became apparent when Sheikh Abdallah Nimr Darwish, the head of the Islamic Movement in Israel, addressed the forum. The crowd, representing a range of political opinions, was quiet, respectful, recognizing the sheikh's courage in condemning anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial. But his refusal to acknowledge the virulence of anti-Semitism that is coursing through the Palestinian Authority and the Muslim world, and his failure to note the existence of initiatives such as the week in February devoted to perpetuating the apartheid slur, made the crowd restive.

Trust is a fragile flower. Without confronting the true difficulties, and without specifically denouncing the rhetoric of apartheid, genocide and delegitimation, it will be impossible for any peace buds to blossom, especially in the Middle East's rocky soil.

We must take responsibility for the impact of our words. Too many intellectuals, by slandering the Jewish state disproportionately and obsessively, not only embolden the lethal anti-Semites, they help trample that trust rather than cultivating it. They should be criticized – and challenged to change.

A woman's guide to Purim

Jewish women seeking biblical role models have embraced Purim as an especially auspicious holiday. Not only does the story of Purim feature an activist heroine who, at great personal risk, saves her people, but it offers a supporting actress, in the form of the deposed (or beheaded) first queen.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

The general plot of the Book of Esther, or Megillat Ester, is clear and straightforward – the first queen's refusal to appear before company at her husband's command sets into motion a multi-level plot involving a search for a new queen among the maidens of the empire, an ambitious aristocrat's plot to murder the Jews, and an intricate rescue from disaster.

However, the text of the Megillah leaves much unspecified and ambiguous, particularly concerning the two queens. Was Esther a willing party to the next-queen competition and to her subsequent marriage to the king? Did she help mastermind or only carry out the rescue? Why did her predecessor Vashti refuse to appear before the king as commanded, an act of defiance that cost her her throne and perhaps her life? Was she a victim or as corrupt as the regime that rejected her?

Classic rabbinic texts offer a range of interpretations about these two women. Vashti, for example, is sometimes depicted as evil, and deserving of punishment, and sometimes as dignified, a foil to the malleable king's buffoonery. According to common midrashim, or narrative commentaries, about the Book of Esther, her husband demanded that she appear nude in front of his courtiers, thereby asserting his sovereignty over her. In that light, her refusal to appear is an assertion of her sense of dignity, and also a statement about her royal lineage. Other midrashim cast her as cruel and debased – deliberately tormenting her Jewish handmaidens, for example, and affronting their modesty. Seen in that way, her degradation and demise is just deserts, a fitting end.

Esther, too, is seen in conflicting terms. Even her very selection as queen has given rise to contradictory interpretations. The Megillah tells us that Esther was selected above all the lovely maidens gathered from all parts of the kingdom. The contenders spend months and months in preparatory spa treatments and beauty baths, and then see the king. The text tells us that Esther was beautiful. Anyone who has participated in or been a spectator at a school Purim play will remember this depicted as a precursor of the modern beauty pageant, with Esther's radiance outshining all the others, without her even seeming to want to emerge victorious. Some rabbinic texts, however, turn that image on its head. They imagine Esther as decidedly unattractive, with a greenish cast to her face. No beauty queen, her elevation to queen was part of the miracle of Purim, not the outcome of a natural selection.

Despite the necessity of her nuptials to the ultimate redemption in the Megillah, the rabbis have difficulty with her intermarriage. They excuse her by seeing her as essentially powerless, an instrument of destiny, with neither love nor desire for her husband, the king. They imagine her struggling to obey Jewish law clandestinely within the palace walls, eating seeds rather than unkosher fare, and keeping track of the calendar.

Did her passivity extend to her response to the crisis of her people? Was she simply acting out the master plan of Mordechai, her uncle (or, as some interpretations have it, her first husband)? Or was she a co-conspirator, an active participant in the rescue from catastrophe? The text depicts her moving from an initial reluctance to take action to masterful strategizing, overcoming her fear and outfoxing a more seasoned courtier. By the end of the Megillah, Esther and Mordechai receive equal billing and equal stature, perhaps as much as a woman could hope for in that time, at that place.

The text of the Megillah and the range of rabbinic interpretations that have accrued to it offer resources for Jewish feminists seeking validation and resonance in classical Jewish texts. Perhaps because Purim is a festival known for turning things upside down and mixing things up, it encourages us to think beyond boundaries we had thought to be fixed and insurmountable, to think creatively, to rethink the possible.

The Kirshner File

The genesis of Israel's settlements

Shortly before Israel signed an armistice agreement with Transjordan in March 1949, Yigal Allon, an Israeli general who commanded the Palmach during the War of Independence and who served as foreign minister decades later, sent an urgent message to Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion asking him for permission to seize the West Bank. Ben-Gurion, though a hawk, refused, knowing that the seizure of the West Bank, with its substantial Palestinian Arab population, would not be in Israel's demographic interest as a Jewish state. Having realistically accepted the partition of Palestine, Ben-Gurion had reconciled himself to the permanency of Israel's ceasefire lines.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In accordance with his pragmatism, the ruling Mapai party, the forerunner of the Labor party, waged the 1965 election on a platform "based on respect for the political independence and territorial integrity of all states in the region." Even the Herut party, led by Menachem Begin, grudgingly agreed that irredentist Zionist claims to the West Bank, part of the biblical Land of Israel, were no longer useful or sustainable. But in the minds of certain ideologically driven Israelis, such as Rabbi Tzvi Yehudah Kook of the Merkaz Harav yeshiva in Jerusalem, the debate about Israel's borders was never a closed matter. Prophetically, on the eve of the Six Day War, he demonized partition, declaring that "the far side of the Jordan is ours."

With Israel's sudden acquisition of the West Bank, Gaza Strip, Golan Heights and Sinai Peninsula, an area comprising more than three times Israel's pre-war size, Rabbi Kook's lamentation ceased to be a theoretical construct. Israel's stunning victory reopened an old debate and recast the national agenda. To this day, it dominates Israel's political discourse, and may for decades to come.

Bedazzled and mesmerized by the conquest of territory dear to the hearts of religious and secular Israelis alike, Israel's leadership, both on the left and right, succumbed to the temptation of keeping it and building settlements to ensure it would remain under Israel's control until the Arabs were ready for peace. The story of this critical phase in Israel's history is the subject of Gershom Gorenberg's fascinating book, The Accidental Empire: Israel and the Birth of the Settlements, 1967-1977 (Times Books), one of the most important works on Israeli politics in many a year. Gorenberg, an Israeli journalist, proves that the settlement enterprise, the result of the Six Day War, was a joint venture of socialists and nationalists egged on by extremists. The architects of Israel's campaign to hold the new territories were, among others, Yitzhak Tabenkin, the guiding light of the United Kibbutz movement; Moshe Dayan, the defence minister; Yisrael Galili, a maximalist minister in Golda Meir's cabinet; Moshe Levinger, a rabbi who successfully advocated settlement in the Arab town of Hebron; Shimon Peres, the current deputy prime minister; and settlers from Gush Emunim, a far-right organization dedicated to maintaining Israeli hegemony in the West Bank.

But it was Levi Eshkol, the moderate prime minister during and after the Six Day War, who legitimized the aggrandizement of Israel. Even as the war raged, he talked of retaining Gaza and the West Bank, and though left-of-centre Mapam party ministers in the unity government objected, his view prevailed and was assiduously promoted by Dayan and his rival in the cabinet, Allon. In addition to coveting the West Bank and Gaza, Dayan had designs on the Sinai as well. As for Allon, he proposed a plan whereby Israel would annex barely populated parts of the West Bank and quickly build settlements there.

These proposals notwithstanding, the Israeli government was not inherently guided by expansionist sentiments, Gorenberg suggests. On June 19, 1967, the cabinet, by a 10-9 vote, passed a secret resolution offering a full withdrawal from the territories in exchange for full peace and security arrangements.

The proposal was conveyed to Egypt and Syria by the United States, but was flatly rejected. Israel began creating facts on the ground and annexed eastern Jerusalem, nearly tripling the size of its capital. Prior to these developments, Allon submitted a plan to build "work camps" on the Golan Heights, the forerunners of the first settlements in the territories.

The role of the United States, Israel's ally, had a crucial bearing on Israel's attitude toward the territories. Distracted by its entanglement in Vietnam and obsessed by its Cold War rivalry with the Soviet Union, Washington gave Israel slack.

With the "three no's of Khartoum" in August 1967, in which Arab states categorically refused to conduct direct negotiations with Israel, make peace with it or even recognize it, Israel was essentially free to pursue its ambitions in the territories.

Interestingly enough, Israel settled the territories in the full knowledge that its actions violated the norms of international law. In September 1967, Theodor Meron, the foreign ministry's legal counsel, wrote a note to Eshkol's political secretary in which he claimed that "civilian settlement in the administered territories contravenes the explicit provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention." But ignoring Meron's directive, Eshkol told the Knesset that "a return to the status quo" would be unacceptable and informed the United States that his speech superseded the June 19 declaration.

Yigal Allon

As Gorenberg notes, Eshkol and his ministers were doubtless influenced by the growing nationalistic climate in Israel. A survey released a month after the war indicated that the vast majority of Israelis were in no mood to relinquish the territories. Nathan Alterman, the legendary poet, likened the territories to "the cradle of the nation" and urged the government to resist territorial compromise. The children of the Jewish settlers who had died defending Kfar Etzion – a West Bank settlement near Jerusalem – during the 1948 war yearned to go back and rebuild. They exerted enormous pressure on Eshkol, as did Rabbi Levinger, a fiery Kook disciple who sought to rebuild the Jewish neighbourhood in Hebron.

Given all these pressures, and the Israeli elite's predisposition to hang on to the territories in the absence of Arab peace partners, Israel altered the status quo with alacrity. Settlements were quietly built and maps in which the Green Line had been erased were published. Israel stealthily designated settlements as "work camps," "agricultural stations" and "nahals," or para-military outposts.

By Eskhol's death in February 1968, Israel had 10 settlements on the Golan and three in the West Bank, with plans to build in Hebron and Gaza. Along with this, the first Jewish neighbourhood in eastern Jerusalem, Ramat Eshkol, was nearing completion, and Israel's grip on the West Bank was tightened through Dayan's Open Bridges policy.

Galili, Meir's chief adviser on settlements, described them as "vital" for Israel's security and survival. It was he who recommended that all plans for new settlements should be accelerated. Peres, the defence minister in Yitzhak Rabin's first government, was pro-settlement, too. By the mid-1970s, 69 settlements had been erected and Israel's policy was based on the principle of "defensive borders." With the Likud's election triumph in 1977, Israel redoubled its efforts to settle the territories.

Today, 250,000 Israelis live in 125 authorized settlements in the West Bank, while 16,000 reside in 32 settlements on the Golan, annexed in 1981. Another 180,000 Israelis are found in eastern Jerusalem. It's clear that this fait accompli has changed the political landscape and cast a deep shadow on whatever is still left of the peace process.

Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund climbs over $300,000,000

Sheldon Esbin and Arthur Resnick manage the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund

Canadian investors can choose from an array of hundreds of investment types: from volatile stocks to low interest GICs. Yet more and more investors are turning to the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund. In the past year alone, investor contributions have added more than $100,000,000 to the Fund.

The Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund is an income fund that pays interest monthly. Over 95% of the Fund is invested in commercial first mortgages, all secured by the respective properties. Contributions are RRSP and RRIF eligible.

While the Fund has grown tremendously, our strategy continues to be conservative, and our performance continues to provide investors with annual distributions in the 10% range.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Feel the joy of Purim

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

When one scans the Encyclopedia Judaica under the entry for Purim, one finds a fascinating list of dozens of individualized community celebrations of Purim throughout history. Many of these observances, scattered throughout the year, commemorate, not the events of Shushan millennia ago, but rather, more recent occasions when communities were rescued from danger.

This expansion of the Purim motif reminds us of the painful pages of our history and our resilience in having withstood so many life-threatening challenges, beyond any reasonable expectation.

Today, too, with threats emanating from Iran and a former American president peddling calumnies about Israel to a wide and receptive audience, we are reminded that our sense of insecurity never lies very deep beneath the surface of our lives.

And then comes Purim, the holiday of frivolity and celebration! Are we right to celebrate? Should our rejoicing be constrained? Should one feel guilty for laughing or smiling during difficult times? Are solemnity and silence more appropriate responses?

These questions also confront us during times of personal sorrow. During meetings with bereaved families prior to funerals, sometimes, in the course of discussion, there is laughter. At times, the incidents and idiosyncrasies surrounding the life of the departed are funny, and family members laugh when recalling them. More than once, a family member has stopped him/herself and said: "I really shouldn't be laughing."

It may be months or even years later, and a surviving family member who experiences joy and laughter will feel deep guilt as a result.

I believe it to be fully appropriate at times to laugh during a funeral arrangement, even, sometimes, at the funeral itself. The laughter, in almost every case, is not a denial of the present pain and loss. That sadness is real and deep. Rather, the laughter is an ultimate statement of survival, testimony that the loss that has been endured has not depleted our ability to remember happy moments. As well, it attests to the gift given to us by our departed loved one, who, by virtue of having given us something to laugh about in his/her own lifetime, has helped enable us to muster the skills necessary, not only to survive, but, more importantly, to resume a life of quality and meaning.

Is it proper to laugh, to smile, to experience happiness, to fully rejoice in celebration of Purim, when confronted by the sober realities of the dangerous world in which we find ourselves?

The answer, I believe, is a resounding "yes." The laughter doesn't for an instant diminish our sense of loss. But it does reaffirm our need, and our right, to move on, to continue to aspire to meaningful, and, yes, even enjoyable lives.

Purim throughout history has reminded us of that need to reaffirm life, even during hard and painful times. Through most of Jewish history, laughter and frivolity have seemed as remote as a distant planet. For that reason, more, perhaps, than any other, our sages mandated a joyous approach to the day. "Ivdu et HaShem b'simchah – Worship God through joy," we are enjoined.

We need never feel guilt for feeling happiness. Rather, the opposite is true. In a world so often devoid of things to smile about, through laughter and helping others to laugh, we achieve the status of mitzvah of the highest order.

The traditional greeting of Purim is as simple as it is profound: "Simchat Purim." These words require no translation, we all understand them. We owe it to ourselves to take the simchah, the joy of Purim, and use it as incentive to seek to bring added joy to our days and those of the people we love.

Celebrating chaos?

Midrashic Moments

The festival of Purim is the closest thing Judaism has to a celebration of the topsy-turvy, which in itself is quite surprising.

The Torah begins with the book of Genesis – a description of creation that carefully outlines how God brings order to chaos. The primordial universe existed as a place of upheaval and randomness, and through seven days, God carefully plans and executes the creation of the universe, resulting in a careful balance of harmony within the natural world.

This, of course, begs the question of why we would have a festival that seemed to celebrate the topsy-turvy. The question is made stronger when we look at the holiday that immediately follows Purim, which is Pesach. Ancient Israelites are redeemed from a slave existence within Egypt and are brought safely through the Red Sea and eventually to Mount Sinai. To commemorate the redemption from Egypt, we refrain from eating leavened goods for seven days. Outside of Israel, Jews will sit together for the first two nights of Pesach and engage in one of the most lengthy of family ritual practices: the seders. The word "seder" means "order."

For the first two nights of Pesach, Diaspora Jews outline a ritual meal carefully planned and laid out. It is important to progress in order from one component of the seder to the next. We are bringing order to the table, order to the sequencing of the symbols and order to our understanding of historic redemption.

Every day, Jews pick up the Jewish prayer book, the siddur. The word "siddur" is a derivation of the same root as "seder," or "order." The siddur orders our prayer, orders our daily life and our life cycles. It organizes our ascent through the daily levels of spirituality and holiness while allowing us to incorporate our mundane, secular lives into the upper realms of holiness, all in a very orderly fashion.

All of this brings us round to the pressing question with which we began. In the face of this overwhelming quest for order and sense, how can we celebrate randomness and a world gone topsy-turvy?

Order can be truly appreciated only when we recognize the need for it and the price of its absence. According to the rabbis of the Talmud, chaos is a thin green line that encompasses the whole world. The act of creation did not abolish things, it ordered them. Therefore, the original state of chaos is always lurking around us waiting for its opportunity. We learn from God and try to bring order.

But the reality of this ever-present chaos must not be forgotten, and that is one of the messages of Purim. A midrash on Purim tells us that when Mordecai was promoted in Persia, there were coins minted in his honour. The midrash explains that one side of the coins showed the picture of a golden crown while the other showed sackcloth and ashes.

Purim reminds us that while we work hard to stabilize the chaos around us, in reality, our lives could change as easily as the flip of a coin. Rather than be overwhelmed by this reality, we learn to celebrate it and manoeuvre through it. When handled properly, even chaos can have a happy ending.

A 'lost city' and the Bible

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

The "lost city" of Ugarit stands as one of the major archeological discoveries of the 20th century. The site was discovered in 1929, during the French Mandate of Syria after World War I. It was a period that saw a number of important archeological discoveries that would have a major impact on Biblical studies. Ugarit was one of the most crucial of these discoveries.

Ugarit is located on the north Syrian coast, opposite the finger of Cyprus. The ancient ruin is now known as Ras Shamra. A meeting place between East and West in the latter part of the Bronze Age, between 1400 and 1200 BCE, it has been a gold mine for biblical scholars. As with most major archeological discoveries, Ugarit was found by accident, by a type who has an intuitive nose for major archeological finds – a local peasant

What made Ugarit particularly exciting was the discovery of a royal archive written in a hitherto unknown alphabetic script, which is almost 500 years older than the Phoenician alphabet; previously the oldest known alphabet. The script was deciphered in record time. It turned out to be written in a Northwest Semitic dialect closely related to Biblical Hebrew. That made scholars very excited. Scholars who followed the theories of Julius Wellhausen, who, in the latter part of the 19th century, analyzed the Bible using the tools of "form criticism," had come to the conclusion that the Bible was written by multiple authors no earlier than the time of the Hebrew monarchy. These naysayers were dealt a serious blow by the discovery of Ugarit. It showed that Canaan had a rich literary tradition, of which the Bible was an important part.

A number of prominent Jewish scholars got involved with the Ugaritic material and used it in their work. They include the well-known American Cyrus Gordon, who published his landmark work on Ugaritic grammar, as well as a dictionary, beginning in the 1940s. (We will discuss Gordon's amazing life and career in another column.) Gordon used the material from Ugarit to put forward the still-controversial idea that the Greek-speaking world and the Canaanites (and ancient Israel) had much closer contact and more in common than is assumed by most scholars.

The Italian-Israeli scholar Umberto Cassuto also used the Ugaritic material in his classic work titled The Goddess Anath. Cassuto, a strong opponent of the Wellhausen school of form criticism who used his considerable talents to challenge some of its major premises, was a strong believer in the relevance of Ugaritic for biblical studies and published numerous articles on the subject before his death in 1951.

Mitchell Dahood, of the Pontifical Biblical Institute, and Marvin Pope, of Yale University, probably wrote the most influential works on the relevance of Ugaritic for biblical studies for the Anchor Bible series. Dahood used Ugaritic for his three-volume translation and commentary on the book of Psalms, while Pope did the same for his masterful works on both Job and the Song of Songs. Pope showed how some of the sensual language used in the Song of Songs had Ugaritic antecedents and was a part of the rich literary tradition of Canaan to which Israel belonged.

It is now more than 75 years since the initial discovery of cuneiform tablets was made at Ugarit. Since then, Ugarit has made an indelible mark in enriching our knowledge of the world in which the Bible originated. The decipherment of the tablets has broadened our appreciation of Hebrew and added new nuances to translations of important biblical texts. It is but another example of how a study of the past has enabled us to go forward in enriching our knowledge.

Purim and kids

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Purim's practically here, and if you haven't gotten around to putting together costumes for your kids, teaching them a song or two, or just telling them some stories about the holiday, it's not too late. All the resources you need are at your fingertips.

Aish HaTorah – featuring the ubiquitous Mordy Mermeltashen – has a large selection of activities geared toward kids and their parents. Jewish Heroes is a series of three workshops designed to stimulate discussion about heroes and heroines. And if you're a mom or dad who doesn't mind letting your kids turn your house upside down for a bit of fun and education, then take a look at the detailed instructions for the Purim Scavenger Hunt. By the time your kids have scoured your house for the 15 clues, they will have learned a great deal about the holiday – without evening realizing it. [www.aish.com/holidays/purim/]

The Cyber Purim Play is really two treats in one. It's a 16-page holiday colouring book that you can print out. But it's accompanied by an audio play that tells the story of the holiday. Great for kids who can't yet read. (You will need the free Shockwave plug-in to hear the site.) Be prepared to stay a while. This is a large site that takes a while to download. [http://tinyurl.com/yukyh3]

Need an idea for your kids' costumes? Just go to Flickr where proud parents have posted more than 100 photos of their adorable progeny bedecked for the holiday.[http://tinyurl. com/3dn3ux] If you opt for something traditional like King Achashverosh, Queen Esther or Haman, then Purim on the Net makes things easy for you. Just print out their masks, ready for colouring. [http://tinyurl.com/yrqd6v]

I'm not sure quite sure of its historical accuracy, but Ben Finkel has put together instructions for making an origami Haman's hat. [http:// tinyurl.com/2xxcbf] If you want to try making a real crown, you can find detailed illustrated instructions online for a beaded crown. The project calls for glow-in-the-dark beads that will make your favourite Queen Esther beam. [http://tinyurl .com/yrgxbh]

Could anything be more appropriate than a hangman game in which you hang Haman? That's what Nurit Reshef has dreamed up in her Purim Games section. There is a huge assortment of games here, including word search and a game in which you can smash that villain. After you've let it out on Haman, you can print out the Hebrew crossword puzzles and a story in Hebrew about charity for which you are challenged to write the ending. [http:// tinyurl.com/yr4k7d]

If you want to have the most expensive gragger on the block, go to the gragger link at the Celebrate with Joi Purim Site and click away. [http:// tinyurl.com/26vmwb] You will hear a genuine rattling noise, but your computer may be a bit heavy to shlep to shul for the Megillah reading. If you want a gragger that's a bit more portable, try your hand at building the one at My Jewish Learning. Follow the instructions and Purim night, take your homemade gragger to shul for a spin. [http://tinyurl.com/2hbhqv]

Your computer can help your kids brush up on some of the basic Purim vocabulary in Hebrew. [www.zigzagworld.com/milim/] Zigzagworld has a lovely little game that lets you build a mask or crown on your desktop while it teaches Hebrew words. [www. zigzagworld.com/mask/] (Please be patient. These games may take a minute or two to load.)

One highlight of a children's Purim celebration is the Purim shpiel or play. Valdosta Hebrew Congregation in Georgia have put their effort online if you'd like to use it as your inspiration. [http://tinyurl.com/ yu42v4]

Artzu Sheva has created the best musical assortment anywhere with five hours of Purim tunes online! The only problem is their Jewish music page is in Hebrew only. (Click on the tab that says "Tayvat Negina," then on "Chagim.") [http://tinyurl.com/3cwos5] If that presents a problem, here's a shortcut that will take you directly to 60 minutes of kids' tunes. [http://tinyurl.com/2ot43a] And if you would like to include some Purim songs on your mp3 players, go to the Aish site and download classics such as Chag Purim and Shoshanas Yaakov and you'll be ready for the holiday in no time. [http://tinyurl.com/2mfq8v]

Hockey marathon planned as fundraiser

Ryan Bernknopf, 23, program associate at BBYO, will be on the trip and seconds Korn's sentiment.

"I know it's going to be something for our participants to remember for years to come," he told the CJN. "I expect it to be really empowering. You see all this [coverage] on the news, but that never really shows the whole thing."

Scott Harding, NRN's executive director, can't overstate the significance of such trips to the residents of Louisiana.

"It's incredibly important," he said. "We want to get the word out... to all of Louisiana that help is still coming in."

Harding estimates NRN has devoted close to 95 per cent of its activities in the region since Katrina and notes there is still much work to be done.

"One of the areas we are now focusing on is St. Bernard Parish," Harding said, referring the Louisiana equivalent to a county. "The parish lost 26,000 homes. Every single house, church, synagogue, hotel... you name it, everything went under water within their county."

Harding believes it will take another year of work before his organization has done all it can in Louisiana.

Both the BBYO and USY have been fundraising to help offset the costs to their travellers – currently $850 (US) for BBYOers and $600 (US) for USYers.

While USY has done this mainly through its own internal channels, BBYO found a unique way to help defray the costs for its volunteers.

Bernknopf has scheduled an event for April 14 in which BBYO members hope to play the world's longest indoor floor hockey marathon.

The current record stands at 24 consecutive hours, held by a BBYO chapter in Edmonton.

Hopeful record breakers were issued a challenge to sell as many chocolate bars as they could, with the winners earning a spot on the floor hockey team.

All funds raised up to Feb. 23 went toward the New Orleans trip. Funds raised afterward are being directed toward "Shoot For A Cure," a charity for spinal cord injuries.

Support from the community for these events "has been just incredible," Bernknopf said.

Any late donations received by the BBYO specifically for the New Orleans trip will be used to further reduce participants' costs, Bernknopf added.

CHAT students write this year's school musical

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Over the past few years, school plays at the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's north campus have included such well-known productions as Bye Bye Birdie, Arsenic and Old Lace, and Guys and Dolls.

This year, for the first time, the school will present an original musical written by two of its Grade 12 students.

Jonathan Blankenstein and Jonathan Fine, both 17, came up with the idea last spring. Their two-act show, Libel in the Bible: and other tall tales, which runs just over two hours, will make its debut Sunday, March 11, at the Leah Posluns Theatre for a one-time performance.

Blankenstein's main academic interests are in the sciences, but outside of school he is drawn to music and theatre, he said.

He fell in love with acting as an eight-year-old camper at the Richmond Hill Country Club Day Camp and went on to act in community theatre. He has also become involved in writing for theatre.

Last year, the self-taught composer, who also plays piano, produced a short play for the Paprika Theatre Festival, an annual event at the Tarragon Theatre for artists under age 21. This year, he is the festival's playwright in residence.

But it was Fine, an alumnus of Leo Baeck Day School who Blankenstein met in Grade 9, who pitched the idea about writing the school play to Blankenstein last year.

At the time, Fine recalls, he was only half serious. "I couldn't believe we would do it.

"I wanted to team up to write a Jewish musical comedy that would play on Jewish history," said Fine, whose background is more in writing than acting. He has been involved in drama at Camp New Moon, and two years ago, he wrote a 20-minute sketch comedy at camp, his first serious effort.

Fine, who is leaning toward studying subjects such as history and philosophy after high school, said he has been influenced by Monty Python movies and Seinfeld.

The two Jonathans, both of whom have academic averages in the 90s, initially took their idea to their drama teacher, Kelli Nish, who approached the school's head of drama, Renee Cohen, with the request.

Cohen, who taught Grade 9 drama to Fine, was excited at the prospect of a student-written play and thought it was worth giving the boys the opportunity.

However, she gave them strict deadlines – and admits that she had a back-up plan, to ensure that there would, in fact, be a school play this year.

By the beginning of October, they had to come up with the bulk of the first act. Three weeks later, they needed a complete script and musical score, because casting was to begin in November.

The two boys "definitely have a real talent for writing comedy" and "have always shown themselves to be dedicated and responsible students," said Cohen, who is co-directing the play with English teacher Joanna Lambert.

"We decided this could be a very good thing for the school, and a really good thing for student morale, to see something on stage done by students for students," said Cohen.

Her first impression of the boys' work was that it was "just a brilliant play."

Cohen describes it as an Into the Woods-style Jewish comedy with "a mélange of [biblical] stories created with different endings." Her reference point is the 1987 Stephen Sondheim musical based on well-known fairy tales.

Writing the school play was "always fun, and always hard work at the same time," said Fine, who had to juggle his work on the script with homework, as well as playing and teaching tennis.

Although the students did much of the writing over the summer, Fine said he "probably spent a few hours each night from September to November [working on the play]."

The two boys, who were "friendly" before their collaboration, became friends while working on the project. Many e-mails went back and forth while they worked individually on different aspects of the script.

Fine was responsible mainly for the sketches, and also wrote lyrics for some of the songs. Blankenstein, who wrote all the music in the play, focused on the "theatrical timing and flow."

Blankenstein, who attended Associated Hebrew Schools and plans to study science at university next year, cited his influences as Broadway composers and classic Broadway shows.

"Not many composers write in that style these days," he said.

Both writers have small parts in the play: Fine has an introductory monologue in rhyme, and both have cameos as "the writers." Blankenstein is also the pianist in the play.

Although the project was conceived as a school play, "we are definitely considering taking it out of school in the future, and having it performed [elsewhere]," said Blankenstein.

Tickets for Libel in the Bible: and other tall tales are $15 in advance, $20 at the door. For more information, call 905-787-8772, ext. 355.

THANK YOU ALL
from the bottom of our hearts

On the evening of February 26, 2006 our family and neighbors watched in horror as our home and all our possessions went up in flames at 35 Ardmore Road... We had only moved in for less than a month and just finished unpacking our belongings. We were devastated.

By the following morning the Jewish Community of Toronto had swung into action. People we knew and those we didn't, heard of our fire and opened their hearts to us. Clothing, toys, food and shoulders to cry on came calling. One person even got together our sons class pictures and put them on disk. We were overwhelmed by the thoughtfulness of the community who helped us through this tragic event. Family, friends and members of the community helped our family get back on our feet and start over. We are extremely grateful to all of you.

We wish to acknowledge the following families and agencies for their help through this tragic event.

Israeli institute prepares rabbinic PhDs

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

If you thought they don't give out PhDs in Halachah, think again.

It's not a degree you can obtain at York University or the University of Toronto, but if you travel to Israel to an educational institute called Eretz Hemdah, they'd be happy to prepare you for one.

Of course, you'll have to devote seven years to an intense program of study and then pass five gruelling exams before you will be granted the prestigious Yadin Yadin certification from the Chief Rabbinate of Israel, the highest level of rabbinical ordination and which is recognized by the government of Israel as a PhD equivalent.

Founded about 12 years ago by three rabbis, "Eretz Hemdah tries to be the Torah leader in the Jewish world, producing a new generation of rabbis," said Rabbi Yosef Carmel, one of institute's founders and its current dean.

Rabbi Yosef Carmel

"It's a post-smichah program" and graduate scholars are recognized as "the top of the pyramid of Torah," he said during a recent visit to Toronto.

Rabbi Carmel was in Toronto to urge local rabbis to explore Eretz Hemdah and its resources.

Eretz Hemdah, which has an enrolment of 35 students, has gained a reputation for the excellence of its program. Its candidates generally outperform rabbis from other educational institutes, and in the last Yadin Yadin test, four of the five students who passed and who were granted the prestigious ordination hailed from Eretz Hemdah. Over the last 12 years, the pass rate of Eretz Hemdah students has been in the 90 per cent range. Generally only 50 per cent of candidates pass any one test, Rabbi Carmel said.

Eretz Hemda attempts 'to serve as a halachic centre for rabbis all over the world'

Eretz Hemda students must, in addition to the heavy workload, agree to devote half a day a week to public volunteer work not in the Orthodox community, he added.

It's all part of complying with the Eretz Hemdah commitment of developing halachic experts, judges and spiritual leaders to better serve the entire Jewish people. In addition to preparing full-time students, the institute also offers enrichment programs for rabbis from around the world who study for periods ranging from one week to one year.

Summarizing the institute's philosophy, Rabbi Carmel said "we are religious Zionist. We are pro Torah umada [the integration of Torah and general studies]. We are pro Torah with derech eretz [integrating Torah with mutuality of respect]. We show that everybody can be with these and be at the top of Torah scholarship."

With the level of knowledge at the school, Eretz Hemda attempts "to serve as a halachic centre for rabbis all over the world," Rabbi Carmel said. "We have think tanks that try to find solutions to almost all problems of halachic life in Judaism."

Its scholars attempt to solve problems even when other authorities assert there is no solution. "To say there is no solution, any little child can say that. To find a solution, you need wide shoulders, deep knowledge and the courage to do it," he said.

Expanding on his assertion that courage is important to a halachic judge, Rabbi Carmel said "sometimes the atmosphere is to go all the way to the right. We are trying to say that if you want to give halachic decisions to the majority of the nation, you must take halachic decisions all the way to the middle. We want to bridge the gaps between the Jewish people and use Halachah to do it."

Asked to comment on a move in the Orthodox world to limit child conversions to Torah observant families, Rabbi Carmel said, "If the parents will raise [the child] up in such a way that he will have a real ability when he is older to choose a way of life of observing mitzvot, that is good reason to accept him as a future member of our nation."

One of the "top issues" tackled by Eretz Hemda scholars is that of agunot, women whose husbands refuse to grant them a Jewish divorce and who cannot remarry. Other key topic include medical ethics, conversion and applying new technology.

One example of the latter cited by Rabbi Carmel is the question whether a Canadian, sitting at his or her computer on a Friday afternoon, can surf the Internet for news from Israel that would have to have been posted there on the Sabbath. Rabbi Carmel advised against it, as doing so would mean the surfer is benefiting from someone in Israel violating the Sabbath.

An agunah case he cited was one in which a husband in his 40s suffered from early onset Alzheimer's. He loved his wife very much and relied on her to assist him. He did not want to leave her in agunah limbo, unable to remarry, but he also realized that as his condition worsened, he might not have the mental capacity to grant his wife a get (divorce) and free her to remarry.

The solution advised by the rabbis was to build on the "get al-tnai," a conditional divorce recognized in Halachah, and create a special get that would take effect one hour before he lost his mental capacity.

Another halachic issue tackled by the institute's rabbis was to respond to a group from Australia calling themselves Noahides – gentiles who under Jewish law are required to abide by only seven mitzvot.

The rabbis were asked if they had permission to wear a kippah? The answer was yes, but they should inscribe on the kippah that they are Noahides.

Asked by the group if they can say Jewish prayers such as the motzi (the blessing prior to eating bread), the response was also yes, but on condition they not recite the portion of the prayer that states that God had commanded them to say the blessing.

Eretz Hemdah operates a website (www.eretzhemdah.org) that includes an "Ask the Rabbi" page, inviting questions on halachic issues. Over the past six years, it has fielded more than 11,000 questions on a variety of topics. The site also offers a weekly Torah commentary that was downloaded more than 250,000 times in 2006.

Greater Toronto Area

Environmental conference set for March 9-11

Torat HaTeva: The Jewish Nature Centre of Canada and Hillel of Greater Toronto are hosting their first Canadian Jewish environmental conference.

The Jewish Environmental Eco-Shabbaton & Conference, on March 9 to 11 at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, is a response to the growing sense of urgency among many in the Jewish community to the current environmental crisis.

The conference features several speakers, including Rabbi David Seidenberg and Noam Dolgin. Rabbi Seidenberg, a scholar of Jewish mysticism and theology, has a doctorate in ecology and Kabbalah from the Jewish Theological Seminary. Dolgin, the associate director of the Teva Learning Centre, is the chairperson of Green Zionist Alliance and the co-founder of Adam Va-Adamah Environmental Society in British Columbia.

The conference will focus on three tracks: Judaism and the environment; the Middle East environment; and Jewish environmental activism and leadership. An experiential eco-Shabbat and workshops and sessions on topics ranging from "Kabbalah and Ecology" to Jewish perspectives on genetically modified organisms will take place.

Arava Institute Alumni, an Israeli environmental institute involved with peace building and environmental research, will present a panel discussion. There will also be a panel about the Jewish response to the environmental crisis, a session on the Jewish environmental movement in North America, and much more.

Kosher organic food will be served.

The North American première of the independent documentary How to Save the World, produced and directed by Tom and Barbara Burstyn, takes place on March 10, 9:30 p.m. at Bloor Cinema. Co-presented by Planet-in-Focus, an environmental film festival, the film is about the bio-dynamic agricultural revolution in India. It is an eye-opener about the far-reaching, devastating impacts of modern agriculture and the green revolution.

The conference is sponsored by Torat Ha Teva, Hillel, the UJA Federation of Toronto Board of Jewish Education and National Jewish Campus Life.

Israeli spokesman talks tough on Iran

Mark Regev speaks to key UJA Federation supporters

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA FEDERATION

He's a familiar, sometimes soothing presence on TV screens, but Mark Regev's familiarity hasn't softened his assessment of the current Iranian regime, led by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

"Ahmadinejad has taken an obscene, racist outlook and he is speaking for a country," said Regev, the spokesman for Israel's Foreign Ministry at a luncheon last week attended by leading UJA Federation supporters. "The official policy of his regime is anti-Semitism. His words are a representation of the policy goals of that regime."

Regev, who reminded his listeners that Iran was behind the 1994 bombing that killed 85 people in the Buenos Aires Jewish services building, said Jews around the world would be irresponsible to ignore Ahmadinejad because his support for worldwide terror is a danger to the entire region. "His immediate neighbours are feeling very threatened," added Regev.

"For that reason," he noted, "some governments that have never talked to us before are talking to Israel."

Yet, despite the harsh reality of Iran, Regev displayed a measure of optimism that international sanctions could deepen splits within the Iranian government.

He was also cautiously optimistic about future peace prospects for Israel. At the same time, he said, that Israel must have "one hand on the sword." It also wants to see "if it is possible to build relationships that can maybe lead to peace in the future." As an example, he cited Israel's relationship with Lebanon and the government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora. "Hezbollah is the enemy," said Regev. "The Siniora government is not. If we take Hezbollah out of the scenario, we could have peace with Lebanon tomorrow."

Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev (l), chats with Morris Perlis, the chair, along with Lesley Binstock Offman, of UJA Federation Campaign 2008. (Photo by Jen Arron)

Regev, however, wasn't quite as hopeful about Syria. "The Syrians have aligned themselves with the Ahmadinejads of the world. If they change, that would be an important step," he noted.

Youth Futures reaches out to Israel's unreachable

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

The question is how does one solve a Catch-22 by reaching out to Israel's at-risk youth who, because of their personal situations, are often unreachable. Here's the paradox, you see. The more at risk you are, the less likely you will access to community services and programs.

The answer is Youth Futures, an educational initiative of The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI). Funded, in part, by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, this new educational initiative addresses the needs of over 300 at risk Israeli children between the ages of six and 18 in a unique way.

"As a result of the increase in economic inequality between communities in the centre of Israel and those on the periphery, the number of youth at risk in Israel has increased," said Morley Brown, co-chair, along with Brian Schachter, of UJA Federation's Partnership 2000 (P2K) initiative, which twins Toronto's Jewish community with Eilat and the surrounding community of Eilot. UJA Federation is helping to fund a Youth Futures project in Eilat.

"The goal of Youth Futures is to provide an equal opportunity to these at-risk youth through skills development and to break the cycle of poverty and underachievement," added Brown.

The program connects youth and teens with a trustee - a role model committed to their success by providing them with personalized intervention; staying the course with each child to ensure that they successfully complete high school and move into the future as confident young adults.

These trustees – university students, college graduates, discharged soldiers and youth leaders - organize activities for their groups of 10 or 20 children and build a trusting "big brother/big sister" relationship in order to mentor and guide. The trustees coordinate all agencies surrounding, impacting and shaping the child's life: the school, the welfare services, the community and the family.

"These wonderful and caring individuals are well-trained, positive and intelligent young adults who want to devote part of their lives by giving something back, by helping the young people of Israel, which, by extension, guarantees a better future," said Nir Lahav, director of Youth Futures. "They really want to make a difference; they want to help fulfill the dreams of these young people."

One of those dedicated individuals is trustee Mickey Gilad, currently helping change the lives of a Jerusalem youngster in Eilat.

"N. is a wonderful child who came to Eilat from Jerusalem under unusual circumstances," said Gilad, who cannot use the child's real name. "He doesn't speak Hebrew very well, and had only his brother for company, being an outsider at school. After meeting with other children in my Youth Futures group, N. became friendly with several of them, and after he joined the summer camp, he's become a big success socially. It was heartwarming to see how N. found the friends he needed so desperately in Eilat."

JAFI hopes that, by the year 2010, the program will be operating in 52 localities in the Negev and Galilee with the goal of improving the situation of youth at risk in both the geographic and social periphery in Israel.

Perspective

Where practical dreamers meet

By PROFESSOR STUART SCHOENFELD

Noa walks down the bus with a bag of fruit that is different from anything I've ever seen - large purple ovals, with prickles that look like pineapple. Up and down the bus, people's faces are smudged purple from the kiwi-like pulp. I later learn that we've had pitayas, from the Center for Sustainable Agriculture at the Arava Institute for Environmental Studies.

We're traveling south in Israel – about fifteen young people in their twenties and a handful of staff - with Jordanian mountains on one side and Israeli ones on the other, through the Arava valley towards Eilat. But we turn off and head East into Jordan to the Aqaba Gulf Hotel. There, more Israelis, Jordanians and Palestinians join us for the second meeting of APEN - the Arava Peace and Environment Network.

Professor Stuart Schoenfeld

APEN was formed last year to network alumni of the Arava Institute on Kibbutz Ketura, now in its tenth year as a Middle East centre for environmental research and education.

The Arava Institute for Environmental Studies is supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto through its Partnership 2000 (P2K) link.

Posters around the hotel meeting room displayed alumni work on changing environmental habits in an African village, recycling practices in Chicago, ecological issues in the oceans, an environmental bike ride through Israel, agricultural water allocations, and fish habitat. Alumni presented work on environmental education, urban gardens, environmental literacy, and environmental theatre.

A description of activities can't capture the warmth and enthusiasm. It is a serious group, but also one that smiles, hugs, leans against each other during meetings and stays up very late because they don't want to miss the chance to be together. The alumni set up a steering committee to plan and involve more alumni, such as the two hundred in North America (including more than twenty in Toronto).

The common experience at the institute is so unusual and strong that even alumni from different years have an instant, positive rapport. They also agreed that using APEN to create a culture of peace and environmental responsibility in the region is important. They are not the only ones working on this, but they know that many, many people think it's only a dream. Practical dreamers though, engaged with water, energy, agriculture, pollution, nature preservation, policy-making, and changing attitudes. Watching these young Israelis, Palestinians and Jordanians working in a common field, appreciating each other, supporting each other, I caught a glimpse of what peace in the region could look like.

Former Gaza residents excited about making the Negev flourish

UJA Federation allocates $1.3 million for Gaza evacuees

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

As teacher and scholar Eli Feinsliver was forced to evacuate his Netzarim home in Gaza in August 2005 with wife Temira and their five children in tow, the 36-year-old was feeling anything but optimistic about his future.

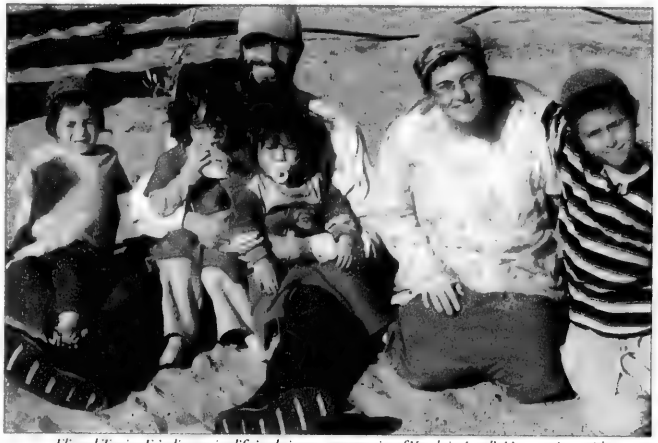
Now, settled in a temporary community in Yevul in the Western Negev, he has seen his negative energy and anger turn into something far more positive: creating a green and flourishing Negev.

"The first year, after being evacuated from our home, needless to say, things were very hard," Feinsliver said in a telephone interview with Jewish Toronto, explaining life during that summer's controversial withdrawal from Gaza. "We spent so much time and energy fighting the withdrawal, then we spent even more time moving from community to community. We all wanted to move together, to keep our community together."

After moving four or five times – "I can't even remember how many times," said Feinsliver, during the first year following the disengagement, he and his family are starting to see – and feel – a sense of normalcy returning to their lives.

"Last year we started to reorganize ourselves and get as settled as possible; we knew we were starting to build a home again when we finally knew the titles of the school books we needed this year," he noted.

Immediately following the withdrawal, UJA Federation, with the support of World Mizrachi chair and Toronto philanthropist, Kurt Rothschild, established the Netzarim Fund, to help former Gaza residents build new communities in the Negev. One of them is Yevul. UJA Federation support for the Netzarim Fund is among many ways that the organization is assisting former Gaza residents.



Eli and Temira Feinsliver enjoy life in their new community of Yevul, in Israel's Negev region, with four of their five children aged 2 to 10. The Feinslivers personify the pioneer spirit of Gush Katif evacuees who have come to the Negev in order to make it flourish.

The Toronto Federation's allocation of $1.3 million for former Gaza residents is the largest of any North American Federation

The Netzarim Fund has already received more than $800,000, through UJA Federation to help the Feinslivers in Yevul and additional families in other communities.

The $800,000 will go toward:

– Playground equipment, books and furniture for educational and religious institutions
– Assistance to needy couples with newborn babies
– Funding for school staff and scholarships for students
– Training children in the Negev region for their Bar Mitzvahs
– Informal education

"We have a vision and a bright future here now," noted Feinsliver. "We are all so excited to be pioneers; to be part of building something so big and so beautiful. We're here in the name of the State of Israel, to make the Negev flourish, to make it green, to carry on with Ben Gurion's dream. We want to build a quality community on deep and important Jewish values – the same values on which Israel itself was built."

Feinsliver, like his neighbours, is excited about the agricultural potential of the region which, combined with Israel's second-to-none technological talents, is expected to produce wonderful organic exports.

"The money sent to us by UJA Federation in Toronto has been a tremendous help in getting things started here – especially in the last year," he said. "Last Shabbat we all got together and ate from our very first harvest of our own potatoes, and man, they tasted great."

In fact, said Feinsliver, Yevul has already seen peppers, cherry tomatoes and an assortment of other tasty treats spring from its land. "This place will be green before you know it," he added.

Exploring organ donations and Jewish law

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

It's not something people like to talk about. But with the number of Canadians waiting for an organ transplant hovering around 4,000, organ donation is a subject that cannot be ignored.

Recognizing the urgent need for discussion and education about the issue, Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation will be presenting "Organ Donation in Jewish Law: A Conversation about Life" on Sunday, March 11.

Sponsored by Helen and David William Brown – longtime donors to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Trillium Gift of Life network, the seminar will include four lectures exploring medical and halachic (Jewish legal) aspects of organ donation.

Rabbi Moshe Shulman, the spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, describes misconceptions about organ donation that exist within the Jewish community and the need to correct them.

"Most people, if you ask them, think that there's a blanket 'no' when it comes to organ donation in Jewish law," says Shulman. "And the answer is that it's not nearly that simple and, while – like most issues in Jewish law – there isn't a monolithic, universally accepted position, according to many authorities, including the Israeli Chief Rabbinate, organ donation is not only acceptable, it's encouraged, within certain caveats and limitations. That's something we want to bring to the awareness of the community. Our intention is that people should come away from the seminar with a very clear understanding of what is permissible and what isn't."

Rabbi Moshe Shulman of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation

Seminar sponsor David William Brown, a trustee of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto – UJA Federation's endowment arm - and a financial advisor to UJA Federation, explains why the program is so close to his heart.

"I'm a recipient of a kidney that was donated by a family whose child was killed in a car accident about 27 years ago, and before that time, I had end-stage renal failure and I was on dialysis. Because of the unselfishness of these parents at a very difficult time when their child was dying, they saw that they could do something good from an awful situation. I feel that it's important to provide a medium for education for this kind of gift that can change someone's life."

Speaking at the program will be Ottawa's Rabbi Dr. Reuven Bulka, Dr. Sam Shemi, Dr. Frank Markel and Dr. Beni Gesundheit.

A young, single mother fulfills her dream

In the middle of an exam one day at Sapir Regional College, near the Gaza border, Chen Nachmany heard the siren warning on an imminent rocket attack. Before she and her fellow students had a chance to run to the nearest shelter, they heard the distant boom of the rocket landing. Luckily, no one was injured. But this attack did not stop the 23-year-old Chen from continuing her studies. "I am a single mother. My dream is to get an education, get a respectable job, and provide for my daughter with dignity. Thanks to the support of so many wonderful people and organizations, including the Jewish Agency for Israel, I am turning my life around." Chen proudly served in the army working as a dental assistant. But her heart went to the wrong man and, at the age of 20, Chen was married with an infant daughter, Ziv. Her ill-fated marriage fell apart shortly after it began. Chen's husband spent all of their money, amassed tremendous debt and had a run-in with the police. When he left the country, Chen's family urged her to get a divorce before her husband disappeared without giving her a "get" and leaving her chained in a terrible marriage. "I got the divorce in 2005 and my ex-husband vowed that he would pay off all the debts, but he never did," says Chen. Chen is now in her second year at Sapir College, studying public policy and administration, and raising her four-year-old daughter. A scholarship from the Jewish Agency – UJA Federation's overseas partner – is giving her the extra financial assistance she needs to get by this year. (Photo by Moshe Stern)

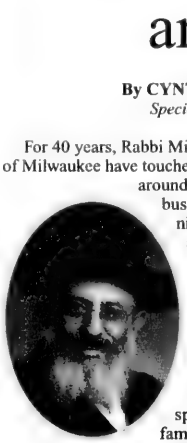
Community honours Rabbi and Rebbetzin Twerski

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

For 40 years, Rabbi Michel and Rebbetzin Feige Twerski of Milwaukee have touched the lives of thousands of people around the world, taking time from their busy schedules in their own community to provide direction and calming advice.



Rabbi Michel Twerski

From March 8 to 11, Toronto's Village Shul will honour the Twerskis and thank the couple for embodying the concept of kol Yisrael areivim zeh lazeh, all Jews are responsible for one another.

"It is this inherent sense of responsibility within the Twerski family which has influenced generations of people and brought a greater understanding of Torah, faith and personal relationships to our community and to the Jewish communities around the world," says Beverley Burdeyney, co-chair of the event with Wendy Zinner.

Burdeyney says that for 20 years, the Twerskis have been part of the Village Shul family. "Through their visits, lectures, workshops and consultations, they have worked tirelessly in their efforts to promote the physical, emotional and spiritual well-being of all whom they meet."

Rebbetzin Feige Twerski

The tribute event for the Twerskis, titled "Becoming the Light," will be held on Thursday evening, March 8, with cocktails and dinner at the Windsor Arms Hotel.

The Shabbat program at the shul will include a presentation by Feige Twerski on "How to Enjoy the Roller Coaster Called Life," and Rabbi Twerski will speak on "Digging for Buried Treasure."

Open to the community, there will be a kiddush and seudah shlishit followed by a Talk & Tish program where the rabbi will weave chassidic tales and songs.

The Sunday programs will include a special session for women, with excepts from Feige Twerski's recently published book, Ask Rebbetzin Feige.

Rabbi Twerski will speak to the men on "Transcending the Chaos." His tapes and music will be available at the synagogue along with the rebbetzin's book.

"We are delighted that the Twerskis will join us in celebrating the spirit of the Village Shul community, as many other members of the community will be joining us on this wonderful weekend of celebrations," Burdeyney says.

For more information on the program or to make reservations, call the Village Shul, 416-785-1107, local 203.

HEDREW BASIC

Dora Heller — Feb 15/07 — 7 Page Street

WAGNER, ISRAEL MORRIS (MOSHE) and RUTH (nee Rabinowicz) –

Peacefully, at home, on Saturday, February 10, 2007, and Sunday, February 18, 2007, respectively, bound as closely together in death as they had been for nearly 60 years in life.

Beloved parents of Jean (Marek) Sutkiewicz, Evelyn (Evy) Moskowitz (Robert), and Charles (Rachel), grandparents of Stephanie (Oren) Lasko, Jamie (Michelle) Shlagbaum, and Daniel (Regan) Shlagbaum, Adam and Rebecca Moskowitz, and Yonati, Daniella, David, and Adin Wagner, and great-grandparents of Jordy and Benjamin Lasko and Mel Shlagbaum. Survived by his brother Naftuli (Henia), her sisters Dina (Willy) Tenenbaum and Faye (Irving) Gold, and his sister-in-law Rivtchu Wagner.

Moshe was born in Stopnietz, Poland, as WWI was coming to an end. He displayed a keen intelligence and an active interest in family, faith, community, and the world at large from a young age. His hopes of becoming a doctor were thwarted by the dark era that enveloped Europe with the fall of Poland, WWII, anti-Semitism, and the concentration camps. It was to the latter that he lost his beloved parents Yechiel and Esther, his brothers Joseph and Hershel, and his sister Malka. He survived the camps with his two brothers, Bennie and Naftuli. Unable to return to his village, he walked across much of western Europe, eventually reaching London, where he worked for the UN Relief Agency taking Jewish orphaned children to Palestine. In 1948, he made his way to Canada with the aid of friends in Toronto. He later in turn helped his surviving brothers come to Toronto.

Ruth was born in Wierzbnik, Poland, the granddaughter of the Byzenchine Rav and a descendant of the Radomske Rebbe (Tiferet Shlomo) and the Yid Hakodesh (the Holy Jew). She was not yet 20 when she and her immediate family were also trapped by the fall of Poland and the onset of WWII.

Her beloved parents, Rabbi Ben-Zion Shlomo and Gittel Rabinowicz, perished at the hands of the Nazis. Ruth and her three sisters were then subjected to the horrors of Auschwitz. Ruth, Dina, and Faye managed to survive, but the fourth sister, Rivka, died shortly after they were liberated. When Prince Bernadotte of Sweden directed his country to take in survivors, the three remaining sisters managed to reach Stockholm and stayed just over two years in a nearby town. Their mother's sister, Edith Shields, and Edith's husband, Louis, learned what had become of the three young women and successfully petitioned to have them all brought to Canada and their Toronto home in 1948.

Destiny unfolds in mysterious ways. One cannot know whether Moshe and Ruth would ever have met had they and their families been permitted to live in peace in their separate Polish towns. But, at a newcomers' dance at Casa Loma that took place within days of Moshe's arrival in Toronto, they met one another and began a new life together that sustained, nourished, and enriched them both for the remainder of their time on earth. Engaged within 3 weeks and married within 3 months, Moshe and Ruthie joyfully started and then nurtured the family neither had ever expected to have, and together they soon became respected members of the Jewish community in this new city.

Moshe started out in construction but soon became a successful builder and land developer as Toronto and environs burgeoned in the years following WWII. Although he provided the means for everyone in the family to thrive, it was Ruthie who was always his inspiration and strength and the anchor of the family. Instilling each of their 3 children (Jean, Evy, and Chuck) with strong senses of identity and self-worth, Moshe and Ruth saw them all grow to become successful parents and contributors to society in their own right.

As their health declined in later years, they remained together in the home where they had raised their family. Moshe passed away peacefully on February 10. One hour after the Shiva for him had ended, Ruthie slipped away to be with him, also peacefully, on February 18.

The funeral services were held at Steeles Memorial Chapel, 350 Steeles Ave. West., one week apart, on February 12 and 19, 2007. On both occasions, each of Jean, Evy, and Chuck delivered eulogies of surpassing love, dignity, and strength.

Interment at Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park, Stopnitzer section. Shivas were held at the family home.

In memoriam donations may be made to the Heart & Stroke Foundation, the Magen David Adom, the Reena Foundation, or the Princess Margaret Hospital/breast cancer research.

Community watching outcome of tight Quebec race

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — There is really only one issue in the Quebec election for the great majority of the Jewish community: ensuring that the separatist Parti Québécois does not get elected.

Quebecers go to the polls March 26 after a relatively brief 33-day campaign. The election call last week, which was expected, generated little discernible excitement in the community.

While overwhelming Jewish support for the Liberals is not going to change, the turnout may be an issue, because people who winter in Florida are often not back until Passover.

In the Montreal area, Revenue Minister Lawrence Bergman is seeking a fourth term in D'Arcy McGee, the most Jewish riding, which consistently has one of the largest, if not the largest, Liberal majorities in the province, at around 90 per cent, and a certain complacency may be setting in.

The other Jewish MNA, Notre-Dame-de-Grace's Russell Copeman, chair of the government's social affairs committee, is also looking for a fourth mandate.

The community's relationship with Premier Jean Charest, the most federalist premier in most people's memory, has generally been positive since he was elected almost four years ago. The one blight was the fiasco that ensued from a rushed plan two years ago to subsidize Jewish day schools' general studies curriculums at a 100 per cent rate. The plan was aborted after a public outcry against the idea and how it was introduced, which felt uncomfortably to many like an anti-Jewish backlash.

The community has little history with André Boisclair, who became PQ leader in November 2005, but he is unlikely to have engendered any goodwill by his recent comment that non-Jews should have the right to eat a "ham sandwich" in a Jewish hospital, after the Quebec Human Rights Commission ordered the Jewish General Hospital to pay $10,000 damages to an ambulance technician expelled for bringing non-kosher food into one of its snack bars.

Boisclair has, on the other hand, affirmed the right of Jews to have kosher food in public hospitals, and his belief in the separation of religion and state by suggesting the crucifix should be removed from the National Assembly.

At least one of the PQ candidates is an apparent friend of the Jewish community. Sébastien Richard, who is running in east-end Anjou, was a public relations consultant to the Quebec-Israel Committee from 2004 to 2006. That seat is currently held by Immigration Minister Lise Thériault.

The community lost a longstanding friend in the PQ caucus with the resignation of André Boulerice.

Action Démocratique du Québec leader Mario Dumont has had friendly, if limited, relations with the Jewish community since he took the helm of the new third party in 1994.

His image, however, has been somewhat tarnished by the position he has taken during Quebec's ongoing "reasonable accommodation" debate.

He has suggested that Quebecers' identity is at risk by what he sees as increasing acquiescence to immigrants and ethnics whose ways clash with Quebec "values." He wants limits to be placed on reasonable accommodation, a term contained in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and the drawing up of a Quebec constitution to entrench what it means to be a Quebecer. However, Dumont reacted angrily and threatened to sue rookie Mont Royal Liberal candidate Pierre Arcand when Arcand compared him to Jean-Marie Le Pen, the French far-right, anti-immigrant politician.

Just how much of an issue reasonable accommodation will be in the campaign remains to be seen. Jews, and especially chassidim, have been the subject of a high proportion of the incidents that the media have played up as instances of accommodation going too far.

Charest no doubt hoped to take some heat out of the rhetoric by creating a study commission led by academics Gerard Bouchard (the brother of former premier Lucien Bouchard) and Charles Taylor, who will be at work over the coming year.

The wild card in the campaign is the new left-wing sovereigntist party Québec Solidaire, which says it will field candidates in all ridings. The party is clearly anti-Israel, supports an economic boycott of Israel, helped organize the anti-war rally last August during the Israel-Hezbollah conflict, and runs information from PAJU (Palestinian and Jewish Unity) – the group that for six years has held weekly demonstrations outside the Israeli consulate – on its website.

Muslim cleric draws fire from JDL leader

By RON CSILLAG

NEWMARKET — Zafar Bangash, the controversial Muslim cleric who's involved in a proposed new mosque here, is "far more dangerous" than Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel, a Jewish activist told a town hall-style meeting of concerned citizens here on Sunday night.

Zundel, currently serving a jail term in Germany for denying the Holocaust, "is a pipsqueak compared to Zafar Bangash," Meir Weinstein, national president of the Toronto-based Jewish Defence League, told about 35 people at a local hotel who came to hear concerns about Bangash, an imam and president of the Islamic Society of York Region.

"He wants an Islamic state in Canada," Weinstein added. "We have a problem here."

Bangash, an imam at a Richmond Hill mosque, has been a hot topic in York Region in the past few weeks for his involvement in Newmarket's first mosque, which has been approved by the town's council.

The founder of the publication Crescent International, Bangash has praised Iran's fundamentalist regime and has reprinted statements from Palestinian terrorists.

Some Newmarket residents have expressed fear that Bangash will have direct ties to the Mulock Drive mosque, where he would continue to spread his radical views, possibly from the pulpit.

But mosque members have said Bangash will have nothing to do with running their place of worship and have distanced themselves from his views.

Weinstein vowed that pressure will continue until the congregation concedes that Bangash's opinions are "repulsive and inhumane."

"He's on record [as] supporting the Iranian regime, supporting Hezbollah," said Weinstein, who, until recently, was known publicly as Meir Halevi. "If, God forbid, his vision of an Islamic state comes to fruition, or close to fruition in Canada, we're doomed."

Weinstein, who helped organize the event, called "House of Worship or House of Terror," said "we have no problem with a mosque. But we do have a problem with an individual who makes certain statements, and we take them very seriously. Because we learned our lessons from the past that not to take such statements seriously could lead to the destruction of millions."

He said he had "just got off the phone" with "someone" at the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), who said Bangash is being "monitored" by the spy agency.

Panelist John Thompson, president of the Mackenzie Institute, said that to "challenge the presence of a radical Islamic cleric is not racism. It's your civic obligation. You shouldn't be afraid to protest before they [radical Muslims] do lasting harm that we'll all regret."

Thompson told the Toronto Star that had he known Weinstein would be on the panel, he would have "called in with the flu."

Bangash is "a clear and present danger" to Canadian security, stated speaker Ron Banerjee, director of the Hindu Conference of Canada.

He accused the imam of "preaching genocide against Hindus and the West."

The community "must not take [mosque members] at their word that Bangash will be working in the background," Banerjee stated.

Weinstein later found himself on the defensive, fending off questions about the Jewish Defence League's own violent past. The FBI has labelled the JDL "a right-wing terrorist group," but Weinstein said the Canadian wing is "independent" from the one in the United States.

Meanwhile, Newmarket Mayor Tony Van Bynen last week hosted the inaugural meeting of the town's interfaith council at Or Hadash synagogue on Leslie Street. Statements of tolerance and understanding were read in area churches on Sunday.

Young Jews flock to booming Panama

By ALINA OLSHENITSKY
Special to The CJN

Five months ago, I bumped into an old high school friend of mine, Jon Ashurov, in one of Toronto's kosher restaurants. After we greeted each other, I asked him the inevitable question, "So what do you do now?"

"I work in Panama," Jon said with a smile as he handed me his card. "You should come visit."

Five months later, I decided to catch a plane down south and see for myself why young Jewish Canadians are becoming attracted to this new Central American hot spot called Panama, and why some of them have decided to call it their new home.

As I arrived in Panama City, I saw with my own eyes what many refer to as Panama's recent "real estate boom." Almost all of the city's main streets are filled with construction sites of future highrise towers, and developments are being created in the most prestigious neighborhoods there.

The bank district is now host to more than 100 international banks, and the city is blooming with U.S.-style malls and luxurious hotels.

When Jon and I met for lunch in the MultiPlaza, one of Panama City's newly built malls, Jon, 25, who with a partner runs a real estate firm in Panama City, told me that they saw a lot of potential for investment there.

"We decided to bring people to Panama and promote it. We right away thought that a Canadian market would react to our initiative, and now we work with markets from the U.S. Canada and Latin America," he said.

Other factors such as excellent health care, a safe environment, a low cost of living and an overall friendly atmosphere played key roles in their decision to relocate to Panama. Jon said that what he likes most about living in Panama City is that people are relaxed and interested in others.

I feel it's almost like a Jewish country

"Business meetings start with a lot of friendly talk. It is important to first build personal relationships and then talk business," Jon said.

Most importantly, the Jewish community in Panama made Jon feel right at home. Owners of some of Panama's top banks, real estate developments, highrise towers and retail stores, Panamanian Jewry have set their footprints all over the city.

There are eight kosher restaurants, including Muki's meat restaurant and the Tel Aviv dairy café, four synagogues and three Jewish day schools. The most noteworthy landmark is a Kosher Super Store, which is the largest kosher supermarket outside of Israel, selling 10,000 kosher products from Israel, U.S., Europe and Panama.

When Jon ordered his lunch, he asked the waiter in Hebrew: "Hakol Beseder?" (Everything OK?) The waiter nodded and, smiling, gave Jon a "thumbs up." I am not sure if the waiter understood what Jon said, but Jon seemed satisfied with the response. "I feel it's almost like a Jewish country," he said.

Other young Canadian professionals, such as Michael Abenhaim, 31, have found a place in Panama's economy and society. Because of the real estate boom and the recent influx of foreigners in Panama, Michael, who moved to Panama five years ago from Montreal, was able to establish himself as the manager of the Latin American branch of a worldwide telecommunications company.

"Up until recently, the telephone business was a monopoly here in Panama, owned by Cable & Wireless," he said. "Now, various companies have come to install themselves here for very affordable prices.

"With the real estate boom, I suddenly have a lot more demand for my product. There are new commercial and residential buildings being built, so I can offer my services to a much larger pool of clientele."

Over coffee at a local café near the business tower where he works, Michael told me about the tremendous changes that Panama has undergone in the five years since he moved there.

"Only five years ago, Panama was a 'virgin country.' It had no malls and very few hotels on the international level," he said. "Now services are being brought to the North American level with new four- and five-star hotels like Decapolis and Playa Bonita."

These changes are reflected in real estate prices, of course.

"Three or four years ago, you could buy an apartment in a high-end area for $600 to $700 a square metre," he says. "Today, you're hitting $1,600 to $1,800 per square metre."

As for lifestyle in this newly booming country, it means keeping active almost 24 hours a day. Although he puts in long office hours – sometimes working 12-hour days – Michael and his friends lead a busy nightlife, going out about five or six times a week to restaurants, bars and clubs. He said the warm weather helps people stay active most of the time.

"Here we don't need to be enclosed into a mall or a movie theatre, and instead of going to a ski resort on the weekends, people here go to their beach houses on Sundays."

Keeping close ties with the tightly knit Jewish community, Michael is part of Hebraica, an informal organization for Jews in their 20s and 30s that puts together activities such as dances, dinners, social events and even poker championships.

Although Michael visits his hometown, Montreal, on a regular basis, he calls Panama City his new home.

"The best feeling in the world is coming back to Panama after a visit to Montreal in January only to discover that it is the middle of summer here," he said.

"I wouldn't trade this feeling for the world."

Coast to Coast

Whatever they are, they're not 'peace talks'

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

The Feb. 19 "tripartite" meeting in Jerusalem involving U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas attracted substantial media attention, even though it was deemed to be mostly a non-event.

By describing the summit as "peace talks," many journalists remained wedded to a story line that revealed a significant misconception about the current state of Israeli-Palestinian relations.

The Globe and Mail's Carolynne Wheeler opened her report by calling the summit "the first peace talks in four years." She did, however, note that the meeting yielded no concrete results beyond a promise to meet again ("Mideast talks signal little progress," Feb. 20).

Although Rice had indicated early in January that she hoped the gathering would spark movement toward Israeli-Palestinian peace, most analysts even then downplayed any reference to "peace." The feeling was that as long as the Palestinian Authority was controlled by Hamas – a group dedicated to Israel's destruction – no "peace" would be possible at this time.

The Feb. 8 "Mecca agreement" outlined plans for Fatah and Hamas to share power within the Palestinian government. However, Hamas refused to accept the three "Quartet" requirements for the resumption of financial aid and negotiations with Israel: the recognition of Israel's right to exist, the renunciation of violence, and the acceptance of previous Israel-PLO agreements. This only made the goal of "peace" ever more remote.

Recognizing this, Rice tried to lower expectations in the days leading up to Feb. 19 and referred to the summit only as an opportunity to exchange views.

Yet, some reporters persisted in the "peace talks" narrative. In the National Post, Margaret Coker of Cox News Service wrote that the Jerusalem gathering was an "effort to restart the Middle East peace process" ("Summit agrees to another meeting," Feb. 20).

Helene Cooper and Steven Erlanger in the New York Times also described the meeting as an effort "to start a new peace initiative" ("U.S.-sponsored Mideast talks conclude with little result," Feb. 20).

Cooper and Erlanger continued: "It is one thing for Israel to begin talks with Mr. Abbas while it is boycotting the unity government [he] helped to negotiate. But it is another for Israel to make meaningful progress toward concluding such negotiations and reaching a peace deal with a [PA coalition] government that refuses to recognize it or renounce violence against it."

Interestingly, the Globe's Feb. 20 editorial, "The Palestinians' move," departed from the common narrative. It bluntly recognized that Hamas' refusal to accept the Quartet's conditions "makes the prospect of serious peace negotiations non-existent."

That's the point. It's not whether Israel can reach a "peace deal" with a Palestinian government that includes the rejectionist Hamas. Rather, it's that such a prospect is so far beyond the realm of possibility that any talk of "peace" at this time is misleading and confusing for readers.

Mahmoud Abbas, Condolezza Rice and Ehud Olmert.
[Israel photo]

Instead of referring to the status of the "peace process," journalists might find it more productive to report on how stability can be maintained. Right now the goal is conflict management, not conflict resolution.

To be sure, in the future, when the proper conditions apply, Israelis and Palestinians may return to a genuine peace process based on the two-state solution – something they were close to achieving many years ago.

Noteworthy for insightful reporting:

• "Israeli hospital heals Gaza fighter's wounds," by freelancer Joshua Mitnick, Feb. 8 in the Toronto Star. The headline says it all, but this unusual piece shows that humanitarian care is available to all in Israel. Barzilai Medical Center in Ashkelon "quietly" treats Palestinian gunmen wounded in recent battles between Fatah and Hamas in the Gaza Strip.

• Doug Saunders' series on Iran in the Globe, Feb. 10 and 12 to 14, gave a rare, behind-the-scenes glimpse into a totalitarian society trying to control an increasingly restive, resistant young generation.

• The documentary Out in Iran, Feb. 18 on CBC News: Sunday Night, also provided a behind-the-scenes look at Iran, examining the persecution, torture and murder of gays and lesbians by a fundamentalist Islamic regime.

Personal grief inspires book on mourning and condolence

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Having lost both of his parents within just 30 days last year, Rabbi Reuven Bulka worked through his grief by doing what he does best: he found something positive to share with others, and he wrote a book.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

Turning Grief into Gratitude: Reflections and Recommendations on Mourning and Condolence is the most recent of the more than 30 books authored by Rabbi Bulka, and it's definitely the most personal.

Written as a tribute to his parents, Rabbi Hayyim Yaakov Bulka and Rebbetzin Yehudis Bulka, it's a warm and loving reflection on their lives and how they shaped the life of the author. It is both a thank-you to them and a way of telling others about these two people who were so modest in life.

"There is much to be learned from my parents' life, and much to be learned from the aftermath, including how grief turns into appreciation," Rabbi Bulka says in the book's introduction.

"In the journey I share with you, the move from grief to gratitude was helped along by a combination of circumstance, of comforting by others, and of reflection on two wonderful and intertwined lives."

The second theme of Rabbi Bulka's book is the mourning process – and, in particular, guidelines for the proper (and improper) ways to comfort a mourner.

Having served as a congregational rabbi for more than 35 years, as well as being a psychologist, Rabbi Bulka has counselled and consoled innumerable people. He is also no stranger to grief himself, having lost an infant son to sudden infant death syndrome (SIDS) and his first wife, Naomi, to cancer.

Yet, he is still sometimes surprised – and even amazed – by some of the remarks made by people in an attempt to comfort a mourner.

In the book, Rabbi Bulka, the spiritual leader of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas, describes some of the apparently well-meaning comments that he has heard, and presents some guidelines for those who are not comfortable in the presence of mourners. Acknowledging that most people really do mean well, he tells of a lecture he gave on this topic as a visiting rabbi at another congregation.

"After sharing some of my observations concerning the pitfalls of mourning at the Sabbath afternoon lecture, I was not surprised that a number of people came over to share their own recollections of stupid things said by people during the mourning period, in the attempt to offer comfort and solace."

One such comment was made during a shivah visit while Rabbi Bulka was mourning his late wife, Naomi. One "local fellow… began his visit with the following insightful question, 'So, Rabbi, what's it like to be on the other side?'"

Rabbi Bulka is well known throughout the Ottawa community. He hosts a television program and two radio programs, writes a regular column for the Ottawa Citizen, chairs numerous committees and participates in a myriad of charitable events. His latest book has been lauded by grief counsellors and clergy of all faiths, including Marcel Gervais, the Catholic archbishop of Ottawa, who said, "No matter how Jewish the context of the stories, their universal quality shines out on every page."

To mark the first anniversary of the deaths of his parents, Rabbi Bulka will be giving a talk about life lessons on Tuesday, March 13, 2007 at 7:30 p.m. at Congregation Machzikei Hadas. For information or tickets (which cost $20 and include a copy of the book), call 613-521-9700.

Cotler defends extension of anti-terror provisions

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Former Liberal justice minister Irwin Cotler said he dissented from his party's decision to oppose an extension of two controversial provisions of the Anti-Terrorism Act because sufficient "oversight" exists to protect against abuse of civil liberties.

The provisions give police the power to make preventive arrests of suspects without warrant and detain them without charge for several days, as well as to hold investigative hearings to compel witnesses to testify if it is believed these measures will prevent a terrorist act.

Under a "sunset clause," the provisions will expire after five years on March 1 unless both houses of Parliament vote to extend them.

Last month, the Harper government tabled a motion to extend the provisions for three years. Liberal leader Stephane Dion announced that his party would not give its support.

Cotler affirmed his position during a panel discussion on security and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms at a conference last month held by the McGill Institute for the Study of Canada on the charter's 25th anniversary.

Cotler, who is now the opposition critic on human rights, noted that he is in favour of the extension today, even though he initially had serious concerns about Bill C-36, the Anti-Terrorism Act, when it was adopted by the Chrétien government following 9/11.

Irwin Cotler

He felt at the time that parts of the bill were not consistent with the charter.

He said seven of the 10 concerns he raised in the House of Commons were subsequently addressed "wholly or in part" and he voted for the bill albeit "with some misgivings."

He was justice minister when the first prosecution was made under the act. Mohammed Momin Khawaja, who was arrested in March 2004, was suspected of being a member of and assisting a terrorist organization based in Britain.

Cotler believes any anti-terrorism measures must adhere to the charter, meaning that "racial profiling" or torture, for example, are unacceptable. But he said there is enough parliamentary and judicial oversight to prevent abuses under the Anti-Terrorism Act, which, he added, also conforms to international criminal law.

Moreover, neither of the two anti-terror provisions has been used in five years, he said. "I conclude if they are not used, they are not abused. They are there if necessary."

Fellow panelist Lorne Waldman, who was Maher Arar's lawyer, said the fundamental weakness in the anti-terrorism legislation is that there is "no accepted definition of what danger to national security means."

He contended that protecting democratic institutions, like due process, is a part of national security as much as protecting lives and property. Waldman finds it difficult to understand how a democratic country can justify the RCMP's sharing of information on Arar with Syria, which is known to carry out torture.

Waldman also thinks it is incompatible with democracy to deny a person who is suspected of being a threat to security the right to challenge the evidence against him. The charter, he believes, can only be "a guide… ultimately it is up to Parliament to make laws that are constitutional."

Jennifer Stoddart, Canada's privacy commissioner, warned that, since 9/11, personal privacy has become an "increasingly fragile freedom" in exchange for "the illusion of security."

There are no checks and balances to prevent the state from intruding on our lives, and the charter has no provisions protecting privacy, she said.

From the proliferation of surveillance technology to the increasingly free circulation of personal information within government departments, Stoddart said Canadians have never been more subject to prying.

In any discussion of the balance between security and human rights, Cotler said Canadians should ask themselves what the situation would be like if there was no charter. He thinks it would be very different.

The adoption of the charter 25 years ago was revolutionary, he said. "We moved from a parliamentary democracy to a constitutional democracy… And the courts from arbiters to guarantors of human rights."

Tay-Sachs testing urged for Ashkenazi couples

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Many Ashkenazi Jewish couples are advised to be tested for Tay-Sachs disease because of its devastating effects and high carrier frequency, but a renowned professor of human genetics says more attention should be paid to Gaucher disease.

While 1 in 30 Ashkenazi Jews are carriers of Tay-Sachs, 1 in 10 carry a gene for Gaucher.

"This is a public health hazard," said Dr. John Barranger, director of the Center for Study and Treatment of Jewish Genetic Diseases at the University of Pittsburgh.

Gaucher is caused by a deficiency of an enzyme that causes excessive bleeding, an enlarged liver and spleen, anemia, bone pain, low energy and a weak immune system.

High carrier frequency cited among Jewish group

The disease is preventable and treatable, but carrier testing for Gaucher is not routinely performed on Ashkenazi Jews in Canada, Barranger said last month at Temple Anshe Sholom, at an information and screening session on genetic diseases that have a higher prevalence among Ashkenazi Jews.

In 1982, Barranger provided the first-ever treatment for Gaucher – an enzyme replacement – on a four-year-old boy. The boy is now 28 years old and has three children. He receives an infusion every two weeks and has no symptoms of the disease.

Barranger said the effective, safe enzyme replacement treatment has been available since 1991.

If carrier testing were performed on parents, physicians would look earlier for Gaucher disease in children and be able to prevent its effects, he said. Because Gaucher symptoms are so variable, it is often not detected until later in life.

But the blood test is not usually included on the Ontario carrier testing panel for Ashkenazi Jews.

A couple considering having children can go to a genetic centre and request a panel of tests, which checks whether they are carriers for Bloom syndrome, Canavan disease, familial dysautonomia, Fanconi anemia group C, mucolipidosis type IV, Niemann Pick disease types A and B and Tay-Sachs.

Kathy Corley, a professional practice leader at the London Health Sciences Centre Medical Genetics Program of Southwestern Ontario, who also spoke at the information meeting, said it is important to get the word out about all of these diseases.

"We want Jewish communities to start ordering these tests, to know the risks and get the information they need."

She says physicians may believe members of the Jewish community are getting tested, but the relative rarity of these diseases has caused the community to become complacent and not seek testing. Testing is available at hospitals with genetic centres.

The process also includes genetic counselling to help the couple understand the risks and carry out family planning.

Most of these diseases affect the nervous system or metabolic system. And with the exception of Gaucher, none of them is treatable.

A parent who carries a mutated copy of the genes that cause one of these diseases, but has no symptoms, is a carrier. This is because every person has two copies of each gene and the normal copy compensates for the mutated copy.

A baby receives half his genetic material from his mother and half from his father. If a baby acquires two copies of a mutated gene, he will inherit the disease. There is a 25 per cent chance of this occurring if both parents are carriers of the same mutated gene.

There is, however, a 50 per cent chance the baby will be a carrier and a 25 per cent chance he will inherit two normal copies of the gene.

If one parent is a carrier of the mutated gene, there is a 50 per cent chance the baby will become a carrier but no chance he will have the disease.

Dr. Peter Ray, head of molecular genetics at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto, said in a phone interview after the information session that at one time, Gaucher was included in carrier testing, but many geneticists opposed it.

While the disease is relatively common, he said, symptoms can range from very mild to very serious, and genetic counsellors were concerned about how to advise couples who learned they were carriers.

For the same reason, last year, the genetics committee of the Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists of Canada and the prenatal committee of the Canadian College of Medical Geneticists recommended that Gaucher testing not be included.

Carrier testing is provided for diseases based on seriousness, frequency, whether an intervention exists and if a reliable, inexpensive test is available, he said, adding that Gaucher was not deemed serious enough.

But at recent community screening sessions such as the one in Hamilton, Gaucher has been included, Ray said.

"I believe if patients want it, it's not my job to say no," he said. "So if a clinic wants the test and agrees to test everyone, we do include it and it is up to the clinic to ensure appropriate counselling is provided."

'The younger generation is unaware of the risks'

Otherwise, couples interested in Gaucher carrier testing must go to the United States for the test, unless they have a family history of the disease, Ray said.

Davida Sobel, a London, Ont. volunteer, who brought the community session to Hamilton, believes the Ashkenazi Jewish population needs to be more aware of genetic testing.

"There used to be routine screenjng for Tay-Sachs. We have skipped a generation with genetic testing," Sobel said. "The younger generation is unaware of the risks."

Ashkenazi Jews are at a higher risk for these diseases. When a population is isolated and tends to marry within their own community, they decrease the genetic variability within the community, leading to an increased chance of inheriting certain diseases.

For information on holding a community information and testing session, call Kathy Corley at 519-685-8140.

VIRTUAL FAMILY TREE WORKSHOPS

The Ontario Jewish Archives, part of the Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage and a department of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, is offering a half-day workshop on how to create a Jewish family tree.

The workshops, given by Bill Gladstone, CJN writer and avid genealogist, will provide an overview of many Jewish genealogical sites available on the Internet. Participants will learn how to use Family Tree Maker, a popular software package, and by the end of the workshop, will be able to locate family information on the Web and create their own family tree. Funding for the Virtual Family Tree Workshops is made possible through the generosity of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

These half-day workshops will run from 1:00PM – 4:30PM on the following Sundays and at 3 different locations:

March 25th (Bernard Betel Centre)
April 22nd (Miles Nadal JCC)
May 6th (Miles Nadal JCC)
June 10th (Lipa Green Building)

PRICE: $50 per person / $75 per couple (includes a free copy of Family Tree Maker)

Institute puts focus on three Abrahamic religions

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Whether you're a student looking to study abroad or an "open-minded traveller" looking for an educational European holiday, the Lessing Institute will provide you with a fulfilling experience, Harry Hurwitz says.

Hurwitz – a Holocaust survivor born in Berlin, a political refugee from apartheid-era South Africa, and a retired professor who now lives in Toronto – is the founder of the Three Rings Project.

Out of the Three Rings Project, an initiative that examines the way western culture is influenced by the three Abrahamic faiths – Judaism, Christianity and Islam – came the Lessing Institute.

The institute, now in its second year, has become the main part of the Three Rings Project, which has three aspects, Hurwitz said.

In 2005, there was a classical concert series, and for next year, Hurwitz is planning a conference in conjunction with New York University, the University of Prague, the University of Berlin and others about nationalism and the rights of minorities.

The third arm of the Three Rings Project is the Lessing Institute's Prague Summer Program, which offers a four-week study program in which students take two credit courses that are transferred to their course of study.

For those who are no longer students and want to take part in the educational experience, the institute also offers a two-week Open Mind Studies program during which participants attend lectures and explore Prague in their free time.

The institute was named after Gotthold Ephraim Lessing, an 18th century German poet who promoted the idea that Jews should be liberated and given the same rights as other people in Germany.

"What Lessing preached was that no one knows which of the three Abrahamic religions God really preferred and you must therefore treat everybody as if they were the chosen people, regardless. This was a completely revolutionary message," said Hurwitz, who has taught at universities in Canada, England, the United States, Mexico and South Africa.

He said that he decided to base the institute in Prague because it "was one of the major cities in Europe and has always been, in the Jewish point of view, the most important. Prague has a history going back to the 1100s and has the oldest synagogue in Europe."

Hurwitz hopes the Lessing Institute will attract people from all faiths who want to learn how the three Abrahamic religions have shaped the world.

The summer program boasts a faculty from prestigious universities all over the world, including York University, the University of Toronto, Ben-Gurion University and the University of Copenhagen.

"It's multicultural, but it is also inter-religious. It's been wonderful to see young students who come from, say, a Muslim background suddenly mixing freely and easily with everyone else and having a wonderful time. If that doesn't leave a mark on them I don't know what does," he said.

Hurwitz said when he met with the Canadian ambassador to the Czech Republic, he said, "'You have created the best export for Canada because what you're doing is what we are all about: multiculturalism, people learning to live with each other, accepting our differences and benefiting from it.' That is the mission of the Lessing Institute. Our mission from that point of view is very clear, very Canadian."

Hurwitz added that the program is not only for students. He wants to attract teachers and other professionals who want an educational experience in Europe.

"We want to get teachers, because teachers are in contact with lots of young minds, and the experience will carry over into the classroom," Hurwitz said.

"The program doesn't treat them like tourists who are sort of gawking at monuments. They come and they take courses with the students."

While students are required to attend the classes and complete assignments to receive the credits, Hurwitz said there is also a lot of free time to explore Prague and travel.

Yulia Pesin, a fourth-year history and psychology student at York, took part in the program in 2006 and recalled what her experience was like.

"The school was right in the heart of Prague. You go to school and the lectures would be about two hours. Then you get a two-hour lunch, which was great because you get to meet up with people, go to shops, little cafes," she said, adding that participants went on excursions to Poland, Germany and took tours around Prague.

Pesin said one of the strengths of the program was that the classes were as small as four or five people and usually no bigger than 15.

"You get a lot of one on one instruction and really get to have more feedback from your professors," she said.

"When there is a class of five students and one professor, there is a lot more he can do than if he had 500 students. They know your name, they can see your strengths and weaknesses within the first week," said Pesin, who enrolled in a course called Religious Wars and another called Psychology of Beliefs.

Pesin said that taking part in the Prague Summer Program was a life-changing experience that gave her an appreciation for other cultures.

"After a while, you fall in love with Prague. You open up to a whole new culture you knew nothing about. You do a lot of things you haven't done before. It just opened my mind to many new things and accepting new people, accepting new cultures, experiencing new things."

Purim Food

Use cookies to make a different kind of dessert

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to the CJN

What better time than your Purim seudah to serve your family and friends a variation of your favourite cookie and at the same time reward your own sweet tooth.

BLACK FOREST OREO CRISP

2 cups Oreo cookies, coarsely chopped
⅔ cup coarsely chopped toasted slivered almonds
3 tbsp. butter or margarine, melted
2 cans (21 oz. each) cherry pie filling
1 qt. vanilla ice cream

Preheat oven to 350. In a bowl combine the cookie crumbs, almonds and butter and mix until well blended; set aside. Spoon the pie filling into lightly greased 13x9-inch baking pan; top with the crumb mixture. Bake for 30 minutes or until pie filling is hot and bubbly and topping is lightly browned. Cool. Top each serving with ⅓ cup of the ice cream. Serves 12.

OREO COOKIE CAKE

15 oz. Oreo cookies
¼ lb. margarine or butter, melted
8 oz. cream cheese, softened
1 cup powdered sugar
12 oz. whipped topping
6 oz. instant chocolate pudding
2½ cup milk

Crush all of the cookies. Set ¼ cup of the crumbs aside. Mix the rest of the crumbs with melted margarine. Press into the bottom of a 9x13 pan.

Blend cream cheese and powdered sugar with a mixer until smooth. Fold in ½ cup whipped topping. Spread the mixture over the crust. Refrigerate for 30 minutes.

In a bowl, combine the pudding mix and milk together and mix until smooth. Pour the pudding over the crust. Refrigerate for 1 hour. Spread remainder of the whipped topping on top of pudding. Sprinkle the top with reserved cookie crumbs. Chill for about 1 hour before serving. Serves 8 to 10.

PEANUT FUDGE AND OREO ICE CREAM DESSERT BAR

⅓ cup butter
1 cup evaporated milk
½ cup chocolate chips
1½ cups confectioners' sugar
1 tsp. vanilla extract
½ gallon vanilla ice cream
25 Oreo cookies
½ cup butter, melted
1 pint caramel sauce
1½ cups Spanish peanuts or dry roasted peanuts, crushed slightly

Fudge Sauce: Mix the ⅓ cup butter, evaporated milk, chocolate chips and confectioners' sugar in a saucepan. Boil for 8 minutes, stirring constantly. Add vanilla extract; let cool and set aside.

Soften ice cream. Crush Oreo cookies and mix with the ½ cup melted butter.

Layer in a 9x13-in. pan as follows: first layer: crushed Oreos; second layer: softened vanilla ice cream; third layer: peanuts; fourth layer: cooled fudge sauce; fifth layer: caramel sauce.

Store in freezer until ready to serve. Serves 8 to 10.

COFFEE MALLOW PIE

2 cups crushed Oreos
4 tbsp. butter, melted

Filling:
27 large marshmallows
½ cup milk
⅓ cup coffee liqueur
1 cup heavy cream, whipped
1 small container whipped topping
grated chocolate

To make crust, combine cookie crumbs with butter and press into a 9-inch pie pan. Place in freezer. To make filling, heat the marshmallows and milk over a double boiler (or microwave). Stir until melted. Set aside to cool. Add liqueur to cooled marshmallow mixture. Fold in the whipped cream. Spoon the filling mixture into the pie shell. Cover and put the pie in the freezer for 1 hour or refrigerate overnight. Serve garnished with whipped topping and grated chocolate. Serves 8 to 10.

Domestic violence and shelters

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash

B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Q My wife left home, without my knowing, with our eight-year-old child. She hid the child in a friend's home and didn't give me access. I reported her to the police. Soon after she went to a women's shelter and reported that I am a violent husband, although I have not been charged with anything and never committed any violence. How can I deal with this? How do I find this women's shelter and my child? Will they lie for women?

They also introduced my wife and child to a new religion. She appears to have agreed to accept their new religion in order to get help from them. I am quite distressed and don't know what steps I can take.

A Women's shelters were set up to assist women who were brutalized by their husbands and had no safe places to go, often with no money. Their trained workers have performed an invaluable service around the world. I have not heard of Toronto-area shelters that try to convert a client to a religion. For obvious reasons their locations are kept secret and are protected by the police.

Nonetheless, I have been acquainted with the odd case where domestic violence has been correctly disputed and later proven either not to have taken place, exaggerated, or even used as a tactic. I am not referring to cases of serious verbal abuse where a woman perceives a threat of violence and goes to a shelter fearing violence. There have been rare cases where a woman might engineer a "flight" to gain easy advantage in a custody, support or even property fight — however rare such a case might be, it has happened.

The sad part is that such cases discredit the overwhelming number of situations where these shelters provide crucial sanctuary for women and their children who truly have no other place to go.

A father such as yourself who feels he has been truly maligned should retain a competent family law lawyer to claim custody of your eight-year-old on an emergency basis. Recite your allegation that you never committed violence and that, in your view, the entire flight was "staged."

Women who run these shelters are forbidden by law to commit perjury, but some of what they have to say in Court is of limited value because it is "hearsay", repeating what your wife tells them. How the Courts decide cases such as yours depends entirely on your credibility and hers. If you did act violently, consider commencing anger management therapy before approaching the Courts.

Hamantaschen you can try

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The midrash says that when the Mashiach comes, Purim will still be celebrated. And just as controversy erupts between Jewish cooks about light versus heavy matzah balls, and whose recipe is the best, I think at the End of Days, Jewish women will still be discussing the merits and pros and cons of each. And the same goes for hamantaschen. Are yeast hamantaschen better than cookie-dough hamantaschen? Which filling is the best? Who has the best recipe?

Some of my favourite hamantaschen recipes follow. Why not try a few different ones, each with a different filling?

If you have a problem with the corners of your hamantaschen opening while baking, check the oven after five minutes and pinch the edges closed again. This should eliminate the problem.

COOKIE-DOUGH HAMANTASCHEN

3 eggs
1/2 cup oil
1 cup sugar
2 tsp. baking powder
2/3 cup orange juice
1 tsp. grated orange rind
1/8 tsp. salt
4 cups flour
1 egg yolk
filling of your choice

Combine ingredients in the order given, except for egg yolk. Mix well. If dough is sticky, add more flour. Chill for several hours. Divide dough into four parts. Roll out to about 1/2 in. thickness. Cut in rounds with a floured cookie cutter or glass. Fill with 1/2 tsp. filling and fold into triangles. Brush with egg yolk and bake at 350 for 30 minutes. Makes about 24.

YEAST HAMANTASCHEN

1 package yeast
1/2 cup lukewarm water
3 cups sifted flour
4 tsp. sugar
4 tsp. salt
1 cup margarine
2 egg yolks
filling of your choice

Dissolve yeast in warm water. Let stand until completely dissolved. Sift together flour, sugar and salt. Cut in margarine. Add 2 beaten egg yolks and yeast mixture. Knead dough for 10 minutes. Roll dough to 1/2-in. thickness. Cut in rounds with a floured cookie cutter or glass. Fill with 1/2 tsp. filling and pinch edges together to form triangles. Put on greased cookie sheet and cover with a clean cloth and let rise for about one hour. Brush with egg whites and bake at 350 for about 20 minutes. Makes about 24.

PHYLLO HAMANTASCHEN

If you want to add an exotic touch to your Purim baking, hamantaschen made with phyllo dough will do the trick. These are based on Moroccan pastries and are crisp and flaky. The recipe may sound complicated at first glance but after you've done the first triangle correctly it will move very fast.

1 cup margarine
1/2 cup oil
1 package phyllo dough
2 cups nuts (almonds, walnuts or pecans), ground
filling of your choice

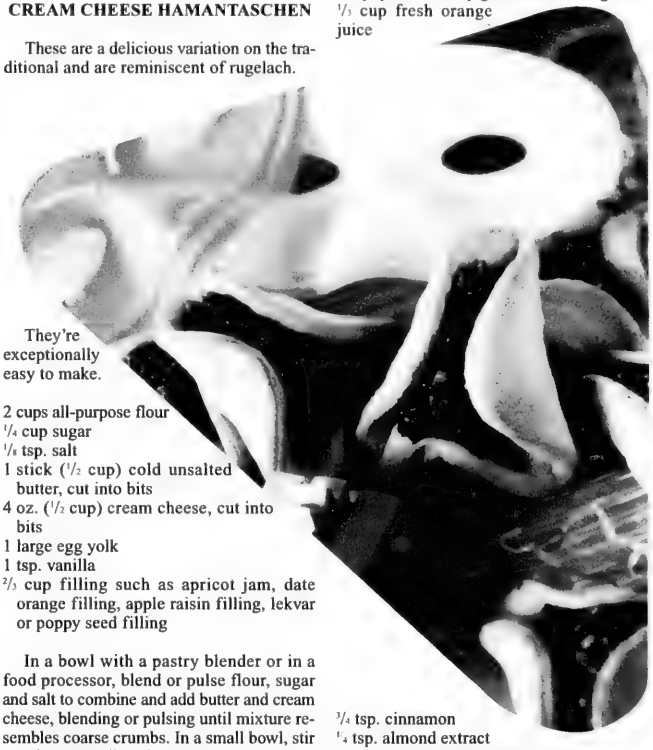
Honey-Sugar Syrup
1 cup sugar
1/2 cup water
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tbsp. honey

Preheat oven to 350. In a medium saucepan over low heat, combine the margarine and oil. Place a damp kitchen towel on the kitchen counter and place a layer of parchment paper over it. Work with one sheet of phyllo at a time and keep the remaining dough covered at all times to prevent its drying out. Place a sheet of phyllo on your work surface and cut it evenly into 2-inch strips. Brush each strip with the margarine/oil mixture and sprinkle with ground nuts. Place a teaspoon of filling one inch from the short edge of each strip and fold one corner over the filling. Fold up the phyllo along its length to make a neat triangle and keep folding until the strip is finished. Repeat, using the remaining phyllo dough.

Place the hamantaschen about 1/2 in. apart on a greased baking sheet and brush again with melted margarine/oil mixture. Bake for 15 minutes, or until golden brown and crisp. Remove from oven and spoon the syrup over each hamantasch. Cool on racks. Makes about 6 dozen.

CREAM CHEESE HAMANTASCHEN

These are a delicious variation on the traditional and are reminiscent of rugelach.



They're exceptionally easy to make.

2 cups all-purpose flour
1/4 cup sugar
1/4 tsp. salt
1 stick (1/2 cup) cold unsalted butter, cut into bits
4 oz. (1/2 cup) cream cheese, cut into bits
1 large egg yolk
1 tsp. vanilla
2/3 cup filling such as apricot jam, date orange filling, apple raisin filling, lekvar or poppy seed filling

In a bowl with a pastry blender or in a food processor, blend or pulse flour, sugar and salt to combine and add butter and cream cheese, blending or pulsing until mixture resembles coarse crumbs. In a small bowl, stir together egg yolk and vanilla and add to flour mixture, blending or pulsing just until mixture begins to come together (do not overmix). Gather dough into a ball and flatten into a disk. Chill dough, wrapped in plastic wrap, at least 1 hour and up to 2 days.

Preheat oven to 375.

Divide dough in half. On a lightly floured cool surface, knead half of dough (keeping other half wrapped and chilled) 2 or 3 times to make it less crumbly. Roll out dough 1/4 in. thick, and with a 3-in. cutter, cut out as many rounds as possible. Transfer rounds with a metal spatula to a large baking sheet, arranging them about 1/2 in. apart. Re-roll scraps and cut out more rounds. Put 1 tsp. filling in centre of each round and fold up edges to form triangular cookies resembling a tricornered hat, pinching corners together and leaving filling exposed. (Pinch dough tightly enough so seams are no longer visible and sides are taut enough to prevent cookies from leaking filling as they bake.)

Bake hamantaschen in the middle of the oven for 20 minutes, or until pale golden. Cool hamantaschen on baking sheet 5 minutes and transfer to racks to cool completely. Make more hamantaschen with remaining dough and filling in same manner. Hamantaschen keep in an airtight container at room temperature 5 days. Makes about 24.

DATE ORANGE FILLING

1 1/4 cups packed pitted dates (about 10 oz.)
1 tsp. packed finely grated fresh orange zest
1/3 cup fresh orange juice
3/4 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 tsp. almond extract
1 to 2 tbsp. water if necessary

In a food processor, blend together all filling ingredients except water until an almost smooth, jamlike consistency. If date mixture is very dry, blend in water, 1 tbsp. at a time. Filling may be made 2 days ahead and chilled, covered. Makes about 2 cups.

PECAN-FIG FILLING

4 cups dried figs
1 cup seedless raisins
apple juice
1 cup toasted chopped pecans

Place figs and raisins in large bowl with enough apple juice to cover. Refrigerate 3 hours, or overnight. Place fig mixture in medium saucepan and bring to a boil. Reduce heat; simmer until soft, about 10 minutes. Let cool; drain, reserving syrup. Puree figs and raisins in food processor along with 1/4 cup reserved syrup. Transfer to bowl and mix in pecans. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate until ready to use. Makes about 6 cups.

Peace or war: what does Syria want?

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Analysis

With Syria talking peace while in the throes of a major new arms buildup, Israeli intelligence is divided again over President Bashar Assad's intentions.

The Mossad intelligence agency argues that Assad is not interested in peace, but only in a peace process to alleviate international pressure on Syria over its meddling in Lebanon and Iraq, and its suspected implication in the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. Military intelligence, however, maintains that Assad is genuine and would be ready for a peace deal with Israel in exchange for the strategic Golan Heights captured by Israel in 1967.

For now, Assad is unlikely to be put to the test. The United States strongly opposes any Israeli contact with Syria on the grounds that even exploratory talks would help get Assad off the hook internationally. Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert agrees and is resisting domestic pressure to engage the Syrians.

Mossad Chief Meir Dagan and military intelligence boss Maj.-Gen. Amos Yadlin spelled out their differences when they briefed Olmert in mid-February on the national intelligence estimate for 2007. Yadlin argued that the possibility of peace with Syria was strategically far too important for Israel to ignore, that it could weaken Syria's ties with Iran and put pressure on the Palestinians to cut a deal with Israel.

Moreover, the very fact of talks with Damascus would lessen border tensions, and if the Syrians knew that at the end of the day they would get back the Golan, there would be a real chance for peace.

But there was a caveat: if peace talks broke down, the Syrians might feel, like the Palestinians after the Camp David failure in 2000, compelled to go to war.

Dagan argued that Assad only wanted negotiations for tactical reasons, on the assumption that talks with Israel would ease western pressure on Damascus, especially from France over the Hariri investigation and the United States over Syrian support for insurgents in Iraq. In the Mossad chief's view, the Syrians have no intention of making peace with Israel, and Israel shouldn't play into their hands.

Despite the accelerated Syrian arms buildup and the absence of talks, both Yadlin and Dagan estimate that the probability of war with Syria this year is low.

In presenting the intelligence estimate to the full cabinet Sunday, both men predicted that Syria would not initiate war against Israel in 2007, but that it would respond if it felt threatened. Military intelligence believes Syria won't go to war until it explores peace possibilities with Israel. The Mossad maintains the Syrians won't go to war because they don't think they are strong enough yet. In Dagan's view, they will go on rearming until they feel ready to take on Israel within the next 10 years.

According to Ze'ev Schiff, one of Israel's leading military analysts, the Syrian arms buildup over the past few months has been on a scale unprecedented in recent times.

With generous funding from Iran, Syria is buying thousands of sophisticated anti-tank weapons from Russia, upgrading its navy and deploying advanced Scud-D missiles with a range capable of covering virtually every point in Israel. The Syrians also recently successfully test-launched a Scud-D missile and reportedly have been supplying Hezbollah in Lebanon with medium-range rockets with cluster-bomb warheads.

Analysts give a number of reasons for the Syrian arms buildup: In the wake of Israel's 34-day war against Hezbollah in the summer, a sense that the Israeli home front is vulnerable to missile attack and Israeli armour to Russian-made anti-tank weapons; fear that if another war between Israel and Hezbollah breaks out in the north, Israel might target Damascus; a desire to use the threat of war to persuade Israel to talk peace; and a desire to be in a position to use force to change Middle East realities.

Some pundits suggest the Syrians are acting out of a sense of insecurity. They point out that Syrian oil supplies are running out, that the Syrians don't fully trust their Iranian ally, that their influence in Lebanon has been severely diminished, that U.S. soldiers in Iraq are on their doorstep and Israel has been conducting large-scale military manoeuvres on the Golan Heights. According to these pundits, insecurity is one of the main reasons for both the arms buildup and the peace overtures.

Olmert, however, remains adamantly opposed even to secret feelers to test Syrian intentions. In a meeting with foreign correspondents Feb. 21, he argued that Syria was still supporting terror, smuggling arms into Lebanon and trying to sabotage its legitimate government. Under these circumstances, Olmert said talks with Damascus would simply help Syria "pretend that it is now a peace-loving country," and help it get the investigations into its role in the Hariri murder and its ongoing military aide to Hezbollah dropped.

"We are interested in peace, not in the 'industry of peace,'" Olmert declared. But Syria doesn't want peace, only a peace process, he said.

"How can you sit down and negotiate with someone who at the same time is preparing to assassinate you from behind your back?" Olmert asked.

Unlike Olmert, Defence Minister Amir Peretz and other mainly Labor ministers are ready to test the Syrians' sincerity. Peretz is deliberately staying low key on Syria's arms buildup to avoid getting into a war of words. He argues that Israel cannot afford to ignore any chance for peace with Syria.

But the differences within the Olmert cabinet are unlikely to come to a head, given the American veto on contacts with Damascus. On her recent visit to Israel, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made it clear the United States is adamantly opposed even to exploratory talks with Syria. When Israeli officials asked her about the possibility of sending out feelers to test how serious Syria was about peace, she reportedly snapped, "Don't even think about it."

The uncompromising American veto makes for two grim intelligence estimates: Dagan's, which sees years of stalemate, with Syria preparing for war as soon as it feels strong enough, and Yadlin's, which sees Syria rearming while waiting for changed circumstances that would enable a peace feeler from Israel or a military move by Damascus.

Security Council members meet to consider Iran sanctions

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

LONDON — Restrictions on trade and arms for Iran were likely to be considered at a Monday meeting of diplomats from the five permanent United Nations Security Council members and Germany, as the world powers seek new ways to pressure Tehran to suspend parts of its nuclear program.

Senior representatives of the six nations were meeting at the Foreign Office in London to discuss how to respond to Iran's failure to respect a UN deadline to halt its uranium enrichment work.

The UN's nuclear watchdog agency confirmed last week that Iran had ignored a Security Council ultimatum to freeze enrichment – a possible pathway to nuclear arms – and had instead expanded its program.

A senior British diplomat attending Monday's meeting said the representatives would examine options for further sanctions, including whittling away at lucrative export credits Iran receives from Europe in support of trade.

Restrictions on arms exports to Iran were also likely to be discussed, said the diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the subject.

Talks began around midday, said a spokesperson for Britain's Foreign Office, on condition of anonymity in line with government rules.

Outside the Foreign Office, close to Britain's Parliament, a small group of demonstrators chanted slogans denouncing Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Many held placards bearing the slogan "Ahmadinejad Must Go."

No conclusions are expected after the meeting. Instead, the diplomats were to return to their home capitals to report on the issues they discussed.

The United States and its European allies have been urging Iran to halt its enrichment program and re-enter negotiations meant to ease concerns that Tehran could be intending to use its civilian nuclear power program as a cover to produce weapons. Iran has refused to give up enrichment and insists its only interest in the technology is for the production of fuel for nuclear power plants.

A spokesperson for British Prime Minister Tony Blair's said Monday that last week's nuclear watchdog report caused concern, and the preliminary talks were aimed at gathering opinions on how to proceed.

"What Iran shouldn't in any way do is make any mistake about the unity of the international community in opposition to its continuing flaunting of what the UN has said its obligations are," said Blair's spokesperson, who spoke on condition of anonymity in line with government rules.

The senior British diplomat said there was evidence that the Security Council's adoption of limited economic sanctions against Iran in December had begun to show success.

The Dec. 23 resolution ordered all countries to stop supplying Iran with materials and technology that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs and to freeze assets of 10 key Iranian companies and 12 individuals related to those programs.

Besides a wider arms embargo and new economic penalties, other diplomats said last week that new, tougher measures could include a mandatory travel ban against individuals on the UN list and an expansion of the list to make more individuals and companies subject to sanctions.

Russia and China, which both have strong commercial ties to Tehran, forced other council nations – the United States, Britain and France – to drop a travel ban and other tougher measures from the December resolution, and it's likely they will resist some of the harsher restrictions this time around as well.

Still, the British diplomat said all participants in the talks supported an incremental tightening of sanctions.

On the possibility of economic penalties, he noted that European agencies provide $20 billion (US) worth of export credits to support trade with Iran and that some of those credits were already shrinking.

Meanwhile, Ahmadinejad remained defiant. State-run radio quoted him as saying Sunday that Iran would press ahead with uranium enrichment. He also described his nation's path as a train with no brakes.

It's the world community that Iran has to answer to, not one of two individual countries – but unfortunately the president seems unwilling to do so, Blair's spokesperson said.

DEADLY DISCOVERY

An Israel Defence Forces officer examines some of the equipment found in a bomb-making hideout in Nablus after IDF raids there last weekend. Among the material found were pipe bombs, two gas tanks and a large quantity of other material such as steel ball bearings that are stuffed into the bombs to become projectiles during explosions. Since the beginning of the year, IDF units have found seven explosives laboratories in the West Bank. [Isranet photo]

Is Israel seeking air corridor to Iran?

By YOSSI MELMAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh denied that Israel was in talks with the United States to use Iraqi air space as part of possible plans to attack Iranian nuclear sites.

Britain's Daily Telegraph, citing an unnamed senior Israeli defence official, reported last Saturday that Israel had sought permission from the Pentagon to use an "air corridor" in Iraq in the event that it decided to launch air strikes on Iranian nuclear facilities.

"We are planning for every eventuality, and sorting out issues such as these [airspace passage] are crucially important," the Telegraph quoted the Israeli official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, as saying.

"If we don't sort these issues out now, we could have a situation where American and Israeli war planes start shooting at each other," he added, according to the newspaper's website.

Asked if Israel had turned to the United States to use Iraqi airspace in any possible attack, Sneh told Israel Radio: "No such approach has been made – that is clear."

"Those who do not want to take political, diplomatic, economic steps against Iran are diverting attention to the mission we are supposedly said to be conducting," Sneh said.

"[They] are anxious to spread the idea that we are planning to attack Iran in order to absolve themselves of the need to do the things that have been requested of them," he added.

Israel and the West accuse Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons under the guise of a civilian atomic power program, which Tehran denies.

Iran has said it wants to negotiate with the Europeans and even the United States, but it has refused to halt its nuclear enrichment activities as a pre-condition for talks.

Neither Israel nor the United States has ruled out using military force on Iran, although Washington says its priority is to reach a diplomatic solution.

Israeli strategic analysts have said it would go against Israeli military doctrine to seek U.S. permission for any possible strike on Iran, given the need for total secrecy.

U.S. Vice-president Dick Cheney said on Sunday that the United States and its allies must not allow Iran to become a nuclear power. The five permanent members of the UN Security Council plus Germany met in London this week to discuss possible further steps, on top of UN sanctions barring the transfer of nuclear technology and know-how that were imposed in December.

Israel capping Ethiopian aliyah?

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

JERUSALEM — In a sign that Israel is taking steps to cap the number of future Ethiopian immigrants, the Interior Ministry has begun delivering rejection notices to Ethiopian petitioners deemed ineligible for aliyah.

Since 2004, Israel has been bringing 300 Ethiopian immigrants to Israel each month from among a pool of several thousand Ethiopian aliyah petitioners. The mid-February change marks the first time Israeli officials have issued a substantial number of denial notices.

In Addis Ababa, members of 385 Ethiopian families whose immigration applications were denied responded angrily to mail couriers seeking to deliver rejection notices, in some cases barring the couriers from approaching their homes.

The Interior Ministry, hoping to avoid violent confrontations, said it was exploring alternative ways of delivering the rejection notices, such as posting them on public message boards.

Some of the petitioners have been waiting up to eight years to emigrate, living in fetid shanty towns near the Israeli Embassy while waiting for word on their applications.

"They submitted their requests, the requests were checked in Israel and Ethiopia, some were declined and some were approved," said Yariv Ovadia, deputy spokesperson of Israel's Foreign Ministry. "This is the nature of requesting petitions."

About 90 per cent of the Addis Ababa petitioners were deemed eligible for aliyah. Ovadia said Israel has no intention of compensating those deemed ineligible to immigrate.

The United Jewish Communities federation umbrella group, which has advocated for and economically supports the aliyah from Ethiopia, said it might compensate the denied petitioners if they agreed to cease all efforts to get to Israel.

"We are prepared to create a responsible mechanism to compensate people who have been waiting for long periods of time and now find that their wait was in vain," said Doron Krakow, UJC's senior vice-president for Israel and overseas affairs.

Ethiopian aliyah advocates in Israel, such as Avraham Neguise of the group South Wing to Zion, said they are furious with the government's approach to the petitioners.

"Let's bring all of them," Neguise said. "These are our people and at the end of the day they'll come."

At issue is the number of Ethiopians eligible for aliyah.

On Feb. 14, the Interior Ministry said 6,899 legitimate petitioners remain in Gondar, the Ethiopian city where the vast majority of petitioners now live. Of those, 1,468 have been approved and will be brought to Israel in coming months. The number of eligible aliyah petitioners left in Addis Ababa is negligible.

Neguise says the number of legitimate petitioners is closer to 15,000, including some 8,000 Ethiopians who migrated from rural villages to Gondar over the past two years to be closer to the Israeli officials in Gondar determining aliyah eligibility.

Both Ethiopian advocates like Neguise and the Interior Ministry base their numbers on a 1999 census conducted by a former Israeli official named David Efrati. That census originally counted some 27,000 Ethiopian candidates for aliyah, but the Interior Ministry said the list shrunk to some 17,000 once the Israeli government made clear its criteria for aliyah.

In intervening years the list has grown by some 3,000 as a result of natural growth, the ministry said.

In all, 11,264 Ethiopians have come to Israel since 2004, according to the Interior Ministry. This week's move is a sign that the ministry is serious about its plan to end mass Ethiopian aliyah once all those eligible from the 1999 group are brought to Israel.

The controversy in Israel over the aliyah of these Ethiopians, known as Falash Mora, stems from lingering doubts over their Jewishness, concerns about Israel having to endure an endless flow of Ethiopian immigrants as a result of fraudulent claims by Ethiopians determined to escape Africa's desperate poverty, and the high cost of absorbing the immigrants. Some also accuse Israel of racism.

The average Ethiopian immigrant costs the Jewish state $100,000 over the course of his or her lifetime, according to government estimates. The Falash Mora claim they are descendants of Ethiopian Jews who converted to Christianity several generations ago due to social and economic pressures. For the past two decades, the Falash Mora, encouraged by American Jewish aid and advocacy groups, have been returning to Judaism and hope to immigrate to the Jewish state.

As their Jewish provenance is virtually impossible to determine, the Falash Mora are being brought to Israel under the Law of Entry designed to unite families with members already in Israel, rather than the Law of Return, intended for those who can prove their Jewish identity.

Some veteran Ethiopian immigrants say the Falash Mora are opportunists or phonies exploiting the system to get to Israel, even though they have been accepted as Jews by Israel's Chief Rabbinate and the three major American Jewish religious movements.

Last week, a group of Ethiopian rabbis and religious leaders claimed that some Falash Mora in Israel are engaged in Christian missionary activity. Among Israeli officials, the primary concern is uncertainty over the number of Falash Mora left in Ethiopia. The aliyah was declared finished in 1998, when Israel held a ceremony at Ben-Gurion Airport in Tel Aviv hailing the last planeload of immigrants, but the number of applicants soared to 8,000 several weeks later as thousands more Falash Mora poured into American Jewish aid compounds in Ethiopia. By 1999, the number had risen to the 27,000 counted in Efrati's census.

In January, with the number again hovering around 8,000, a coalition of Ethiopian advocacy groups in Israel claimed that an additional 8,000 had turned up in Gondar.

Last month's unprecedented issuance of denials, along with the Interior Ministry's public release of the numbers on their lists, is a sign that Ethiopian aliyah advocates may face an uphill battle getting those lists expanded beyond the current group of 7,000 or so petitioners.

Israel Briefs

Quartet reaffirms conditions

The diplomatic "Quartet" overseeing Mideast peace efforts reaffirmed its demands of the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority. Officials from the United States, European Union, Russia and United Nations said in Berlin they would continue to call on the Palestinian Authority to recognize Israel, accept past peace deals and renounce terror if the government wants western aid. But the Quartet also reserved judgment on the recent power-sharing deal between Hamas and the more moderate Palestinian faction Fatah, with diplomats saying they would meet again when the new cabinet takes shape.

Israel gets welfare minister

Israeli Tourism Minister Isaac Herzog moved to the Social Welfare Ministry as part of a long-awaited cabinet shuffle. The welfare portfolio had largely been neglected by the government until now, but Herzog vowed to use it to step up benefits to Israel's underclasses and offset growing wage disparities. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Herzog would also be responsible for liaising with Diaspora Jewish communities and fighting anti-Semitism. The tourism portfolio will go from Herzog's Labor Party to the Yisrael Beiteinu Party.

English Ramallah radio

A South African Jewish man is financing an English-language radio station in Ramallah. Fashioned after 702 Talk Radio, a popular South African radio station, the new station was set to launch this week. The aim is to inspire "peaceful dialogue," said Isaac Kirsch, who gave $50,000 (US) – or about 25 per cent of total startup costs – to the project, Ha'aretz reported. The station will be called 93.6 RAM FM, short for Ramallah and also meaning "high" or "lofty" in Hebrew. Its parent company, Middle East Broadcasting Holding Ltd., is based in South Africa. The station did not accept government funds and "will not toe any political line other than peace," its news editor said.

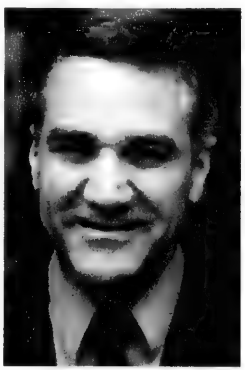
Natural supplement can boost stem-cell count

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A recent discovery that a natural botanical extract can increase the number of stem cells released into the blood stream may offer a non-controversial way to benefit from stem-cell research.

Christian Drapeau, director of research and development at Desert Lake Technologies in Oregon, is the co-inventor of StemEnhance, a natural botanical extract that triggers the release of adult stem cells from bone marrow into the bloodstream.



Christian Drapeau

Through a natural process, those stem cells then travel to areas of the body where they are most needed, said Drapeau, who holds a master's degree from the Department of Neurology and Neurosurgery of the Montreal Neurological Institute at McGill University.

StemEnhance, a blend of two compounds extracted from the aquatic botanical aphanizomenon flos-aquae (AFA), affects the stem-cell system of regeneration, added Drapeau, who has more than 13 years of research experience in the fields of natural foods and nutrition.

"Stem cells have life in the bloodstream anywhere between six minutes and six hours, the average being one hour. When stem cells are released from the bone marrow, they patrol the body… for a part of the body that is having a problem," he said, adding that circulating stem cells become cells of an organ that needs repair, helping it maintain optimal health.

The controversy over stem-cell research usually surrounds the use of embryonic stem cells, because starting an embryonic stem-cell line requires the destruction of a human embryo – a process that is opposed by members of the pro-life movement.

But stem cells have been proven to treat spinal-cord injuries, degenerative conditions such as Parkinson's disease, and cardiovascular diseases. While adult stem cells have demonstrated such potential, some believe that embryonic stem cell have more potential to benefit other parts of the body.

StemEnhance, which was released onto the market in November 2005, claims to increase the number of stem cells circulating in the blood stream by releasing your own adult stem cells from the bone marrow.

Most medical procedures involving stem cells are invasive techniques for cancer patients who are undergoing radiation treatment that depletes the bone marrow's supply.

"There is a compound injected in the blood called G-CSF, granulocyte colony-stimulating factor, which stimulates the release of stem cells from the bone marrow in a very significant way. Once the number of stem cells has increased in the blood, then it is possible to harvest them. We freeze them, and then later on after the radiation treatment, we can re-inject stem cells in the patient's blood. It will migrate to the bone marrow, and this will reconstitute the bone marrow," Drapeau explained.

He said that his product is not meant to be a substitute for a transplant because StemEnhance stimulates the release of stem cells from the bone marrow and if you are receiving post-radiation treatment, you don't have any stem cells to release.

But, he said, StemEnhance can be a substitute for the process of injecting stem cells into the body to increase a person's stem-cell count in the bloodstream.

Drapeau said that people operating in the underground markets in countries like Mexico, Germany, Korea, China and to some extent, in the United States and Canada, will inject people with stem cells.

"We're talking about injecting umbilical-cord stem cells. Umbilical-cord stem-cell injections are problematic when it comes to supply and cost. It costs about $10,000 to get an injection of umbilical-cord stem cells… People can also get injected with embryonic pig stem cells, duck stem cells, sheep stem cells. People get injected with all kinds of embryonic cells."

But Drapeau believes that not only is StemEnhance as effective in increasing the number of stem cells in the blood stream, but there is much less chance of complications.

Injections of foreign stem cells can be rejected by the body, but one dose of StemEnhance naturally increases the number of your own circulating adult stem cells by 25 to 30 per cent, which corresponds to about three million cells, Drapeau claimed.

And, he said, studies have shown that simply releasing more stem cells from the bone marrow into the bloodstream can lead to optimal health.

Drapeau said that recent studies suggest that the higher the number of circulating stem cells, the greater the ability of the body to heal itself.

He said that based on a study conducted last year, the number of stem cells in the bone marrow was one of the predictors of cardiovascular health. In other words, a person with a lower stem-cell count was more likely to suffer from a heart attack than someone with a higher count.

"More stem cells mean the development of more blood vessels in any tissue that may lack oxygen a little bit," he explained. "[Stem cells] simply repair the heart by rebuilding blood vessels that help the delivery of oxygen, so you can solve the problem as it comes."

Very careful not to portray StemEnhance as a drug, since it has not been approved by the FDA in the United States or by Health Canada, Drapeau said the reason he didn't go the pharmaceutical route is because a product like StemEnhance doesn't fit the "normal medical mentality," which dictates that one product is good for one thing.

"If you have a headache, you take a Tylenol. But you don't take Tylenol to treat diabetes. Here you have a product that once it releases stem cells, if you have a heart attack, it can regenerate the heart. If you have Parkinson's, it can repair the brain. If you have diabetes, it can repair the pancreas. If you have liver problems, it can regenerate the liver."

Drapeau said discovering a natural way to help your body heal itself is a major advantage.

"By supporting the system, you are giving your body an edge to be as good as a body can be to reach an optimal state of health."

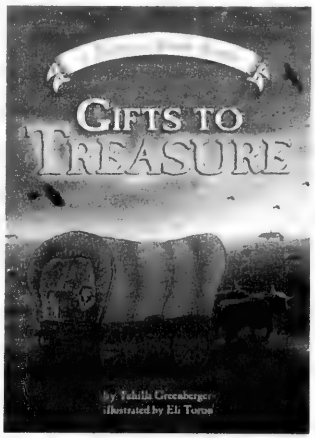
Making a life as pioneers and Jews

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Can you imagine what it must have been like for children to come to North America from Europe and have to cope with a world where absolutely everything was different? That includes the food, the weather, the houses, even the day to day routine.

And can you imagine also trying to keep up Jewish customs and laws in that situation?

That's what happened to the Rabinovich children when they came to the United States from Russia in 1897. Their story is told in Tehilla Greenberger's Gifts to Treasure (Hachai Press, 2007), with illustrations by Eli Toron.



At the time, life for Jews was very hard in Russia. Not only was there terrible poverty, but the Russian government encouraged the population to attack the Jews. These attacks were called pogroms, and Jewish people, homes, stores, even whole villages were in great danger.

Many Jews – including the Rabinovich family – took the brave step of moving to the new world. The American government had passed The Homestead Act in 1862 to encourage people to settle in the American midwest, rather than in the cities. The head of a household could claim 160 acres of land. He had to live on the land, build a house at least 12 by 14 feet, make improvements and farm for five years. Then the land would be his.

For Jews, who were not allowed to own land in Russia, this was a wonderful opportunity.

The father would often go to America by himself and earn enough money to bring the rest of the family from Europe. It could take years.

Papa Rabinovich spent four years in North Dakota all by himself, building a house, planting crops and starting a farm, before he could bring his wife, his daughters Chaya and Raizel and his son Moshele from Russia. Just think how happy they were to see each other again.

For the family, even the trip to the farm from Ellis Island, where most immigrants landed, was an experience. They had to travel in a wagon, which had to hold not only them, but all the things they had been able to bring from Russia. Chaya especially, who was very curious, wanted to see the gold that people thought lined the streets and roads of America. She soon realized that there wasn't any gold.

When they got to the farm, there were a lot more surprises. The house, called a soddie, was made of bricks made from the hard earth. The walls were also of dirt, very thick, which kept the house cool in summer and warm in winter. Well, sort of. It got so cold in winter that they needed a stove to heat the two rooms, as well as to cook on. Since there was no wood, the stove was heated with buffalo chips – what was left after buffalo came by. Collecting them became one of Chaya's jobs – as was milking the cow, gathering the eggs and helping around the house.

In addition to everything else, the dirt fell from the ceiling; when it rained, everything in the house got wet; there were mice and insects in the house; and there was no kosher (or any other) meat, chicken or fish.

Gradually, the family learned to cope, and got used to the livestock that kept appearing inside. There were even a few other Jewish families, so that holidays could be celebrated together. There was also a rabbi who taught the boys Hebrew subjects – girls at that time, got very little Jewish education.

Other Jewish families also meant there were other Jewish children, and Chaya and Moshele especially found friends. Chaya's friend Fraydel taught her how to make dolls out of corn husks.

One of the worst parts of coming to America was leaving their family and friends behind, knowing they would probably never see each other again. Remember that there were no telephones, e-mails or convenient travel.

Before the family left, their grandparents gave each of the children a special present. Zaide gave Moshele his watch, to remind him to make time to keep mitzvot, the Jewish commandments. Bubbie gave Raizel her beautiful Shabbat necklace. To Chaya, she gave what looked like a rusty, twisted nail. Chaya was very hurt, until she found out what it was. When their grandparents were first married and they didn't have much money, Bubbie lost her wedding ring. She was devastated. Zaide went into his barn and bent a nail into the shape of a ring. Bubbie wore that ring, even when they could afford real jewelry – until she gave it to Chaya.

When their first year was over, the Rabinovich family realized how much they had accomplished. They had learned how to keep Jewish customs and had helped develop a small Jewish community. They had gained confidence and independence, and learned to survive and even thrive in a very harsh land.

King and Queen

adapted from the Book of Esther and the Midrash

Queen Esther looked out the palace window, gazing at the crowds below. To her left lay the royal city of Shushan, capital of the Persian empire. Below her was the King's Gate, entryway to the palace. She looked around. Where was Mordechai?

Mordechai had raised Esther from infancy after the death of her parents. He loved her like his own daughter. Esther vividly remembered the day when the king's soldiers took her away from him.

"Esther," he told her, "never forget that you are Jewish. But keep your Jewishness a secret. Tell nobody." Even when she was in the palace with all the other girls who were brought there, Mordechai came every day to check on her. He couldn't get inside, but he would walk back and forth in front of the palace until she noticed him out the window. They would exchange silent glances, looks of hope and encouragement.

And then King Achashverosh chose her as his queen. Queen Esther, queen of the Persian empire! Most girls would be thrilled, but she wanted nothing more than to go back to Mordechai and live like a Jew.

Five years had gone by since Esther had come to the palace. Mordechai still came to check on her daily, mixing with the crowds at the King's Gate.

So where could Mordechai be? She usually spotted him right away. She examined the crowds again and again, but he was nowhere to be seen.

There was a knock at the door. Esther closed the window shade. "Come in!"

The door opened and Esther's lady-in-waiting entered.

"Your Highness, that Jew Mordechai that you are always asking about is going around the city with ashes on his head, wearing sackcloth, and screaming."

"What?" Esther was alarmed. Something terrible must have happened to Mordechai. Had he been robbed? Was he left with so little that he didn't even have a decent set of clothing to wear?

"Quickly, send him some clean clothes," ordered Esther. She opened the shade again and looked to the left. There was Mordechai in his torn clothing, crying and wailing. A servant approached him, bearing a clean set of clothing. Mordechai shook his head, refusing to take them. Esther's heart sank. He must be dressed that way as a sign of mourning.

"Hasech!" she called.

"Yes, Queen Esther?"

"Go to Mordechai and find out what is going on."

Esther waited anxiously for Hasech to return. When he did, his face was grim. "What happened?" she demanded. Wordlessly, he handed her a scroll. With trembling hands, she unrolled it.

"Confidential: To all the nobles of Persia. By order of the King, on the 13th day of the month of Adar, all Jews in the empire are to be eliminated, men, women and children. Their possessions should be plundered. Begin preparing for the liquidation, but do not publicize it until further notice." The document was signed with the royal seal.

Esther looked up, her face ashen. "What ...why?"

"The new prime minister Haman is behind this," explained Hasech. "He bribed the king and received permission to do whatever he wants. Mordechai told me we must act now. The time has come for you to tell the king that you are Jewish. Beg him to revoke the decree and save your nation."

Esther shook her head sadly. "Tell Mordechai that right now there is nothing I can do. I am sure he knows that you can't just come to the king. Anyone who enters the king's inner courtyard without invitation is executed on the spot, unless the king has mercy on them and stretches out his sceptre as a sign that they should live. And I am not sure the king would. He would be furious that I came in unbidden. And even if he spares me, it would hardly be the time to start asking favours from him! Listen, I haven't been called to the king for a month. I am sure that soon he will summon me and then I'll talk to him."

Mordechai's response was immediate.

"Esther, my dear, do not think that you are any safer than we are. You must go now, before it is too late. Who knows? Perhaps this is why God made you Queen."

Esther's answer was tinged with fear, yet strong.

"Gather all the Jews of Shushan. Fast and pray for me for three days and nights. Then I shall go to the king, and if I die, I die."

On the the third day, Esther dressed herself in her best queenly robes, encrusted with pearls and rubies. She slipped on her golden shoes and adjusted her crown. It was time.

Escorted by her servants, she walked toward the inner court. Her footsteps echoed through the vast corridors. In front of her stretched the seven chambers leading to the throne room. Silently praying, she entered, alone. The guards glared at her. They could kill me right now. The guards made no move toward her. She continued, her heart pounding. At the end of the corridor, she could see the massive throne, flanked with golden lions. Achashverosh was sitting there, and he didn't look too happy. The sceptre, stretch out the sceptre, she silently begged, but he didn't. She kept walking. It was too late to turn back. She could hear the soldiers whispering to themselves.

"Kill her."

"You kill her."

"Fine, but I get her crown."

"I get her shoes."

"Please, God," begged Esther, "have mercy on me and my people."

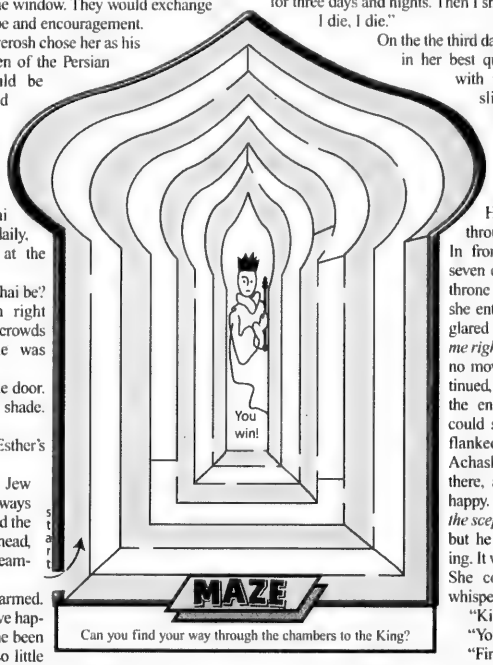
The soldiers raised their weapons.

Achashverosh smiled at Esther, and slowly extended his sceptre.

"Esther, my precious queen, what is it? What do you wish? Ask for half my kingdom and I will give it to you."

Keeping her composure, Esther replied lightly, "I would like to invite the King and Haman to a banquet which I have prepared. Then we will talk."

You can find out how Esther and Mordechai succeeded in thwarting Haman's evil plans and saved the Jewish people from destruction by reading the Book of Esther or listening to it on Purim at your local synagogue.



Can you find your way through the chambers to the King?

Soprano bridges cultures with her new diverse CD collection

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

If you've ever wondered where to find Jewish, West Indian and African-American songs in one place, your question has been answered.

Acclaimed Toronto soprano Denise Williams has assembled a diverse cultural collection of songs on her latest CD, Walk Together Children: A Collection of Black and Jewish music.

Sung mostly in the 20th-century art song and operatic styles, Williams puts a silken-voiced, beautiful twist on some of the iconic classics from both cultures.

Singing in Yiddish, Ladino, Hebrew, Creole, various African languages and English, Williams offers up a rich, ethnic musical stew.

The old spiritual Wade in the Water sits comfortably next to Dona Dona, and an uplifting Ose Shalom cozies up to the gentle Allunde Alluya, an African prayer lullaby.

And those are just four of the 20 splendid tracks on the CD.

The project has been a labour of love for the affable Williams, going back more than 12 years when she first conceived of the album through her initial performances as a support singer with the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir in 1994.

From there, the repertoire for Walk Together Children developed and was presented at various events and locations around Toronto, including the Yiddishland Cafe, the Ashkenaz festival and the Ford Centre (now the Toronto Centre for the Arts), and on CBC radio's Music Around Us broadcasts.

Toronto soprano Denise Williams

She spent long hours perfecting her pronunciation of Hebrew, Ladino and Yiddish for the Jewish songs on the album.

Williams has always maintained that the music is but a small reflection of a natural bond shared by the two cultures.

"There is a deep affinity between the historic struggles of blacks and Jews, and a rich common ground in their music as well," she wrote on her press release for the CD. "They have each faced centuries of oppression, and have fought long and hard for equality and freedom, often supporting one another together with hope, faith and the saving grace of humour."

Williams unveiled the CD to various colleagues and venues late last year, but officially launched the album on Feb. 11, with a concert at the Al Green Theatre in time for Black History Month.

Since then, she's had terrific feedback on the project from both the Jewish and the black communities.

"I got a warm, embracing reaction across the board," Williams said. "In fact, when I went into Israel's Judaica store [to promote the album], a saleswoman there saw the CD and shouted, 'Oh my god! This is wonderful!' It's not always that you see a black face on the cover of a CD with Jewish songs."

Though not Jewish, the Antiguan-born Williams said she happily considers herself a living example of the "Toronto mosaic."

"This album… represents Denise Williams growing up in Toronto," she said. "I often shop in the kosher sections. And I love blintzes [and] latkes as much as rotis, Jamaican patties and lasagna."

Williams hopes listeners will hear the beauty in the languages showcased on Walk Together Children, and hopes she's done a small part to keep them relevant in her medium.

"We need to keep these languages at the surface," she said.

OTTAWA-BORN ACTOR PLAYS IN PIRATE QUEEN ON BROADWAY

Perhaps you saw her as Anne Frank in the Toronto production of The Diary of Anne Frank; or perhaps in the Toronto production of Urinetown, or at Stratford's Into the Woods, in which she played Red Riding Hood.

Ottawa-born actor Jennifer Waiser, 28, is currently deep into rehearsals for The Pirate Queen, a new Broadway musical by the famous French creative team of Alain Boublil and Claude-Michel Schonberg.

Jennifer Waiser

Directed by Frank Galati, the show is based on the life of Grace O'Malley, a legendary 16th-century Irish pirate, chieftain, lover and mother. Previews begin March 6 and it opens April 5 at the Hilton Theatre, 42nd Street and Broadway.

"It's pretty exciting," Waiser told The CJN last Wednesday, just as she was leaving for rehearsals. "It's great to be involved in a new project – it's much better than doing a revival.

"You get to be involved in the whole creative process and to work hands-on with the team that wrote Les Miz and Miss Saigon. It's pretty neat. Boublil and Schonberg are with us every day. It's a cream-of-the-crop creative team and the quality is pretty awesome."

Waiser was originally cast as the young Grace O'Malley, but when that part was cut she was given a lesser role in the ensemble. However, she is still thrilled by the opportunity to work amidst such talent. "I wake up each day very excited to go to work," she said.

She has been working professionally since attending the arts program at Canterbury High School; she took a year off to appear in the Mirvish production of Jane Eyre in Toronto. She completed her training in Ryerson University's theatre program.

"She's the only Canadian in the show," said proud mother Joni Waiser of Ottawa. For details about The Pirate Queen, visit the website www.thepiratequeen.com.

The Tahmila Ensemble from Israel

Concert brings Chinese and Jewish performers together

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The Tahmila Ensemble, a group of students from the Jerusalem Centre for Middle Eastern Classical Music, will perform at the Chinese Cultural Centre in Toronto as part of an evening that features Chinese, Middle Eastern and Jewish music.

The event, Between Heaven and Earth, on March 4 at 7:30 p.m., brings together Jewish and Chinese performers, including Anna Guo and the Dunhuang Chamber Ensemble, the Yun Dance Studio and the Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir.

The Chinese Cultural Centre and the Jewish community of Toronto have partnered in the past to explore the fascinating history of shared experiences, said Canadian artist Ian Leventhal, the executive director in Toronto of the Jerusalem Foundation.

He added that as a co-producer of Between Heaven and Earth, the Jerusalem Foundation, in celebration of its 40th anniversary, is proud to introduce Tahmila to North American audiences.

"They are a unique blend of Middle Eastern fusion with a fascinating mix of Spanish, Turkish and Persian influences," he said.

The Tahmila Ensemble's instrumentation includes the bandir, a wooden frame drum with a membrane; the riqq, a frame drum with Persian or Kurdish origins; the bansuri flute, which originated in India and Pakistan; the djembe, the most common and popular drum in West Africa; the oud, a Middle Eastern lute; and a guitar and bass.

At the centre, there will also be an art exhibition in conjunction with the concert. Titled "The Meeting of Two Cultures," the exhibit features The Good Wall, an installation by Rochelle Rubinstein; selected works from the collection of Afonso Chen; "The Road to Jerusalem," photographs by Jack Toledano; and "Memories of the Shanghai Ghetto," photographs by Eric Goldstaub.

The artistic director and conductor of the Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir, Benjamin Maissner, cantor and director of music at Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple, recently returned with the choir from the International Choir Olympics in China. The choir will present its ever-popular shtetl to Broadway selections, along with a look at the ancient traditions of Ladino, African and Italian-Jewish music, at the the upcoming concert.

Guo, who plays the dulcimer-like yangqin, is a founding member of the Shanghai Silk String Quintet. Since immigrating to Canada, she has participated in numerous concerts and musical functions with various chamber ensembles and orchestras. She has a solo album, Anna Guo Yangqin Music, and she teaches at the Royal Conservatory of Music.

For more information on Between Heaven and Earth or for tickets, contact the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada, 416-635-5491, or e-mail jerusalemfoundation-toronto@rogers.com. The Chinese Cultural Centre is located at 5183 Sheppard Ave. E.

The Tahmilla Ensemble also performs at the Free Times Cafe on College St. on March 4 at 3 p.m., at the BJCC-Jewish Community Centre on Bathurst St on March 5 at 2 p.m. and at the Anshe Minsk Synagogue, 10 St. Andrew's St. in Kensington Market at 7 p.m.

Shul gives sense of responsibilty to musician's singing

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

At times his voice carries the timbre and rhythmic energy of Van Morrison, and you can also hear semblances of Tom Waits and even a male version of Rickie Lee Jones in his singing.

Waiting On Your Love is Noah Zacharin's sixth and best CD. It's a polished, professional package of 11 mostly romantic songs with folksy, eclectic arrangements. Lyrically poignant and filled with strong musicianship, the musical tracks are the product of a gifted lyricist and musician who clearly puts his heart into what he does.

I first encountered Zacharin some years ago at the Minsker Shul in Kensington Market, where he has been leading Shabbat services for about a dozen years. I still remember how bluesy the service sounded and I told him so when we met again recently at a coffee shop on Eglinton Avenue West, across from the Village Shul.

"A lot of what I do as a singer has come out of the last few years, and I attribute a lot of that to what I do in the synagogue," he said.

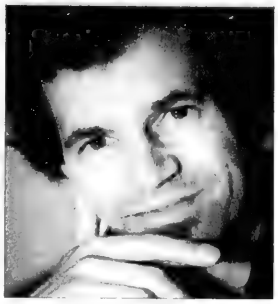
"Getting up to lead services, that's quite a big responsibility. I really had to dig in and see what I was singing about and really just go for it. And I found that, over time, that sense of responsibility and honesty and taking risks started to affect the way I sang my own songs as well."

While some of his lyrics reflect the romantic naturalism that has long been a staple of the popular song, surprising and original images – as when the narrator of the title track describes himself as "a Calder junkyard sculpture draped in skin" – crop up frequently.

Equally pleasing are the music's various unexpected turns and modes. Convertible Kind falls into a New Orleans jazz mode while In the Heather reflects a rich Celtic sound. Sick At the Heart takes on a dark jazz feel with tenor sax and electric guitar, and All Go Blind runs rampant with bluegrass mandolin, banjo and fiddle.

Waiting On Your Love, which was recorded in a professional studio, took two years to produce and presented many more challenges than Zacharin had anticipated. He celebrated its release with a concert with his band at Hugh's Room in November.

With commercial studio backing and a promotional machine going full tilt, this is the kind of album that could hypothetically earn lots of radio airplay and perhaps a coveted spot on the popular charts – it's that good. But being an indie product, it will have to vie for attention with thousands of other indie products.



Noah Zacharin

Zacharin admits that he'd rather put his heart into his artistry than into the sort of business thinking and self-promotion that's needed for commercial success.

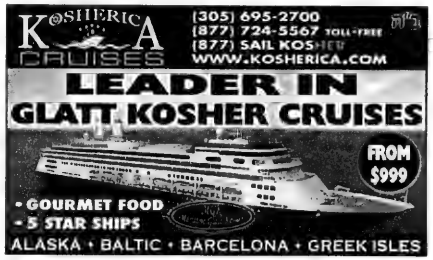
"I worked so hard on this record and I feel a responsibility to get it out there," he said. "But more than that, I have a strong craving to withdraw again and work on new songs."

The former Montrealer, who moved to Toronto about 20 years ago, practises dentistry in a community health centre in Toronto's east end, and has limited time to devote to the business side of his music, especially since he keeps a busy concert schedule, both locally and abroad. He has some U.S. dates coming up and is planning a concert tour of England and Europe in the summer.

"I like the feel of being up there alone and trying to 'tame the lions' – trying to win the love and attention" of an audience, he said. "I like being part of their lives, and I like being up there and offering something that they might want to be a part of. It's a challenge. It's something that I love. I'd like to do it on a bigger scale."

Already this month he's hosted a blues night at the Free Times Café and played with a band called the Guitar Boys of Alderon at the Winterfolk Festival. Upcoming gigs include dates at the the Liberty Café on March 10, and the Now Lounge for City Roots on March 15.

His website, www.noahsong.com, has further information about the gigs and instructions on how to sample his music or order his very listenable CD.



Film expands on Purim story

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to the CJN

The story of Purim is familiar to most Jews.

We grew up with it from our earliest childhood days, and most of us remember how Queen Esther and her uncle Mordechai defeated the evil Haman and saved the Jews of Persia from annihilation. And we also remember Megillat Esther being read aloud in our synagogues and how we would shout and twirl our graggers whenever Haman's name was mentioned.

Now a major film company has made a feature film about the Purim story called One Night With The King. FoxFaith, a division of 20th Century Fox that specializes in biblical and religiously themed films, made this retelling of the story of Esther, about how she saved the Jewish people from the evil Haman.

Although the filmmakers took some liberties with the story and expanded on the Book of Esther, the film depicts how a young Jewish woman became queen of Persia and then used her position to thwart a plot to kill all the Jews.

The film is beautifully shot, and it boasts lush cinematography and an all-star cast that includes Peter O'Toole, Omar Sharif and John Rhys-Davies. Esther is played by the beautiful Tiffany Dupont, while Luke Goss, John Noble, James Callis and Jonah Lotan play some of the other major roles.

Despite the epic scope of this film and the beautiful production values, it does stray from the story as told in the Megillah. Love interests, a war element and lots of dirty politics within the palace are added to fill out the bare bones. And even the main elements of the story are somewhat altered.

But it does make for an interesting film to watch and its recent release on DVD was timed to make it more accessible to its audience.

Another recent DVD release is the comedy Only Human. This Spanish-language film tells the age-old story of introducing your parents to your significant other, but with a twist.

In this case, the parents and the young woman are Jewish, but her boyfriend is Palestinian. When she brings him home, hysteria ensues as one outrageous twist follows another.

This comedy, first presented at last year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, is fun for one and all. It features Oscar-nominated actor Norma Aleandro and provides more than a few laughs.

Both films should be available at most good video stores, or you can purchase copies at www.amazon.ca.

Essayists recount destruction of Jewish fashion industry

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

An unusual and unique exhibition, Broken Threads: From Aryanization to Cultural Loss – The Destruction of the Jewish Fashion Industry in Germany and Austria, was mounted by the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre and the Original Costume Museum Society eight years ago.

The exhibition, the first of its kind, featured the period clothing of Claus Jahnke, a local collector with a passion for history and an interest in textiles.

Broken Threads, published by the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre, is a spinoff of the exhibition. Consisting of brief illustrated essays focusing almost exclusively on Germany, it's edited by the centre's executive editor, Roberta S. Kremer.

Kremer, who also teaches museum studies at the University of British Columbia, leads off with a piece titled The Holocaust and Cultural Loss, which places the topic in perspective.

On the eve of Adolf Hitler's accession to power, Jews owned 80 per cent of Germany's department and chain stores, and 60 per cent of the wholesale and retail clothing trade.

She adds that Berlin's major department stores – Wertheim, Herman Tietz, Nathan Israel and KaDeWe – were Jewish-owned.

In an essay, From Rags to Riches, Jews as Producers and Consumers of Fashion, Christopher Friedrichs explores the rise of Jews from lowly rag-pickers to exalted entrepreneurs.

During the Middle Ages, the vast majority of Jews were poor, shut out of powerful trade associations known as guilds. Since only members were permitted to practise various trades and crafts, Jews were strictly forbidden to make goods they could sell on the open market to Christians.

Jews, however, were allowed to sell recycled goods, and thus many earned a living by peddling second-hand products. With the elimination of anti-Jewish restrictions in the 19th century, Jews tapped into new commercial opportunities and prospered. By the end of that period, Jewish clothiers were "a fixture" in both Germany and Austria.

According to Friedrichs, Jews were at the forefront of the development of the department store.

As he puts it, "Until the early 19th century, most goods were still manufactured by hand and sold in the workshops where they had been produced. With the growing complexity of the manufacturing process, the point of sale increasingly became detached from the place of manufacture. Soon there were general stores which sold a variety of dry goods. Eventually some of them evolved further into true department stores. In Germany, many of them were founded by Jews."

Christian Schramm, in Architecture of the German Department Store, notes that the grands magasins of France served as a prototype.

"The decisive step for the future of German department store architecture was the construction of the Wertheim department store," he observes.

Built in three phases from 1897 onward, it was eventually Europe's largest department store.

Schramm says that the Wertheim template in Berlin was copied by large and medium-sized cities throughout Germany. "These stores helped to decide the character of the city," he states.

Between 1926 and 1929, the five largest department stores – Karstadt, Kaufhof, Tietz, Wertheim and Schocken – grew into substantial enterprises employing 10,000 to 20,000 people.

Ingrid Loschek, in Contributions of Jewish Fashion Designers in Berlin, says that the ready-to-wear clothing trade, or Konfektion, became a model for industries in London, Paris and New York. One of the first individuals in that business was Jacob Israel, a used clothing peddler whose descendants established a department store empire.

In a survey of major boutiques that catered to the rich and famous in German society, Loschek cites such salons as Glaser & Gotz, Flatow & Schaedler, Gerson, Prager & Hausdorff, Max Becker and Regina Friedlander.

With respect to designers, she mentions Ernst Stern and Otto Haas-Heye. Stern, of Romanian origin, designed costumes for the films of Ernst Lubitsch, a popular director. No less a personality than the sultry actress Marlene Dietrich modelled his creations. Haase-Heye, the founder of Berlin's famous Couture Salon Alfred-Marie, was also a painter and publisher. Due to the war, he closed his salon in 1917. But in 1920, he was appointed a professor at the School of the Museum of Applied Arts.

Not surprisingly, Jewish journalists from Elsa Herzog to Ola Alsen played a pivotal role in German fashion journals such as Elegante Welt and Die Dame.

Friedrichs writes that anti-Semites resented the fact that Jewish manufacturers, clothiers and tailors created the fashions that draped the bodies of German women.

The Nazis harped on that theme ad nauseum. They claimed that the flower of German womanhood was contaminated by the "impudent" and "insolent" fashions of "Jewish racketeers," and argued that racially correct clothing was a necessity for "noble German women."

One pro-Nazi author wrote: "Powers are at work to destroy feminine dignity. They are sworn to annihilate the Aryan race, which is chastely conscious of its human dignity."

Shortly after the Nazi era began in 1933, Georg Riegel, a seasoned ready-to-wear manufacturer, took it upon himself to form a purely Christian garment industry.

His objective was to break the Jewish "monopoly" in the industry and permanently eradicate Jewish influence in the design, production and sale of German clothing and textiles.

It was no easy task, since even the wives of highly placed Nazi officials, including Magda Goebbels and Emmy Goering, frequented Jewish fashion houses.

Ultimately, as Irene Guenther points out in an essay, the Nazis succeeded in rooting out Jews.

Many of them were deported to ghettos in eastern Europe, others were sent to SS slave camps, and a handful were put to work in so-called "tailoring shops" in Auschwitz.

The Jewish owners of "Aryanized" department stores and fashion emporiums never recovered their properties. A few launched lawsuits in an attempt to regain what they had lost, but in vain.

CJN Profile

Fantasy author's 10th novel has a modern setting

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

There's something different about Ysabel (Viking Canada), acclaimed Toronto fantasy author Guy Gavriel Kay's 10th novel – its time frame. "This is the first book I've ever written that is entirely set in the here and now," says Kay, adding that though the opening scenes of his debut novel The Summer Tree (1984), the first in his Fionavar Tapestry trilogy, were also contemporary, "the thrust of it is not [set in the present day]."

Ysabel is the name of an impossibly beautiful woman who, every 70 years or so, is brought back to life in Aix-en-Provence, on the eve of Beltane, the Celtic festival that has spooky similarities to the original historical observance of Halloween.

Once resurrected, she plays her part in a recurring love triangle, involving a Celt (Cadell) and a Roman (Phelan) who compete for her affections. Unexpectedly, their existence is revealed to a callow 15-year-old Canadian, Ned Marriner, who has accompanied his famous photographer father, Edward, on a shoot in Provence for a coffee-table book. Though threatened by Phelan, the boy is inexorably drawn into the ancient drama, leading to startling revelations about Ned's family and continuing encounters with supernatural events and otherworldly protagonists.

As with Kay's other books, Ysabel is packed full of interesting characters, provocative scenarios and highly descriptive passages. He even manages to avoid the clichés that often pop up in these types of stories; the cellphones, for one, always work.

In many ways, Provence itself functions as the most arresting character in the book, the place where past and present collide, changing all who are caught up in that collision. Kay chose Provence as the setting for Ysabel because of something he observed upon his frequent work related visits to that part of France. (Both A Song for Arbonne and The Lions of Al-Rassan were written there.) "What fascinated me for this book, one of the reasons it's contemporary, is I started to think about the ways in which the most beautiful parts of the world are often the parts with the most complex, violent history… areas which are temperate and fertile and physically beautiful and can sustain life will be coveted – they become battlegrounds for that reason.

"I became more and more conscious of that and I wanted to work it into a book, this duality of very great beauty and graciousness and underneath it [the violence]. You trip over it, you can't help but trip over the remains of Celtic sacrificial places… and very, very beautifully laid-out Celtic villages or towns that were smashed flat by Roman catapults. They're all around you. In a certain sense, it's a love letter to Provence," says Kay about Ysabel, "but it's a love letter with an extreme awareness of the dark side of the loved one."

The use of the modern setting and motifs in Ysabel also represented a challenge for Kay. "It takes me three years to write a book. It's a long, focused labour. I can't do it unless I'm deeply engaged by the theme, by the technical challenges, by the whole process. Challenging yourself is I think how you grow as a writer." He notes approvingly that one book reviewer wrote, "This is the first time [Kay] can write about history instead of working in history and evoking periods for contemporary readers."

Ysabel also diverges from much of Kay's previous output in that its magical elements are more prominent; many of his past novels hardly featured any traditional fantasy tropes, a departure from the norm that either enthralled readers or dissuaded them from sampling his work. "I've never deliberately said I'm going to play down magic or play up the supernatural. I've always regarded it as tool in a writer's arsenal, that if a given book requires it, I'll use it. If it doesn't, I'm not going to use it to boost appeal."

Guy Gavriel Kay

Outside America, where genre labels seem to be mandatory, Kay is often not even considered or marketed as a fantasy writer. "I'm published as a political novelist in [South] Korea," he points out, adding that Tigana, which centred on a people whose very name cannot be mentioned after they are cursed, was published there with an introduction of how it linked to the Japanese occupation of Korea in the early part of the 20th century.

That idea of a people whose identity is the subject of possible erasure does, of course, refract Jewish history, though Kay's most explicit Jewish reference, besides a significant Jewish character in The Fionavar Tapestry, pops up in The Lions of Al-Rassan, in which the Kindath, a religious group who are periodically subject to blood libels yet also patrol the highest corridors of power as advisers to the king, are clear stand-ins for the Jews.

Kay's other significant Jewish connection is through the officially authorized website, Bright Weavings: The Worlds of Guy Gavriel Kay (www.brightweavings.com), created by Deborah Meghnagi, a Jerusalem-based book editor. In 2004, he was also the guest of honour at Israel's premier science fiction convention – Hebrew is one of the 21 languages in which his books have been translated – an experience which moved him deeply.

"An amazing number of soldiers, men and women, were in line, having asked for and received leave to come for the day to get their books signed. It was really touching and what was also really touching was how young so many of these people were."

These days, Kay is trying on a new hat, that of Hollywood screenwriter. Though he has written for television and radio, as the principal writer on The Scales of Justice, and penned an unproduced script (with George Jonas) of Robertson Davies' What's Bred in the Bone), Tinseltown has never beckoned before. "Hollywood is taking up more of my time now. The Lions of Al-Rassan is being developed by Warner Brothers – they've optioned it for [director] Ed Zwick [the Oscar-nominated Blood Diamond]. Classy people are doing this. The Last Light of the Sun is being developed by [producer] Robert Chartoff [Rocky, Raging Bull] and I'm writing the script for that one."

He's also educating the public on the whole process of the book business, through his reportage on the Bright Weavings website. "I'm doing a journal on how books get from a manuscript that an author gives to a publisher to the book on the shelf in a bookstore. I find it really interesting that so many people who love books have no idea how books get made, how and why does an author tour, who gets an ad [for his book in the newspapers], how does an ad get put together in the Globe and Mail."

All this is a long way from how Kay, 52, imagined his life would turn out after he acquired his law degree (he never practised). "Realistically, I expected to be practising law. I hoped for Morley Torgov's lifestyle, [a] practising corporate lawyer who wrote his books on evenings and weekends and holidays, published infrequently because he was very busy raising a family and carrying on his practice."

Kay's been writing long enough – since 1984 – that he's also seen a new-found respect accruing to him from some of his earliest mainstream critics, who were reflecting their own prejudices about fantasy writing.

"I think the literati perception [of me] was shaped by the fact that my first trilogy was purely high fantasy. I've often said that origin is destiny. How you're defined early is how you may always be defined, but over the years that's been eroding and evolving. The last couple of books, [the] mainstream reviews [Washington Post, Time magazine, National Post) have been the best I've ever gotten.

"The sense I've gotten is that the mainstream literati are gradually shaking off pre-suppositions about genre and fantasy. Some of that has to do with the fact that I'm published very well, very intelligently in many countries. The rest has to do with a kind of Jewish prairie stubbornness. I've been doing this for a long time [and] after awhile if you keep working at a relatively high level, consistently, you will eventually find people get it."

UN marks repeal of 'Zionism equals racism' resolution

JTA

NEW YORK — The United Nations hosted two panels Feb. 23 marking the 15th anniversary of the repeal of a 1975 UN resolution denigrating Zionism as racism.

The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations convened a lunchtime commemoration of the December 1991 repeal, honouring efforts – ultimately unsuccessful — by the late U.S. senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan and then-Israeli president Chaim Herzog to block the 1975 resolution.

Chaim Herzog, Israel's ambassador to the UN, tears the resolution during the debate in the General Assembly in 1975.

Earlier in the day, Israel's UN ambassador, Dan Gillerman, took part in a panel discussion organized by the UN Department of Public Information.

Gillerman called the 1975 resolution "an obvious nail in the coffin" of Israel's relationship with the United Nations, setting in motion a campaign of demonization of Israel that continues to this day.

In a statement, Conference of Presidents chairman Harold Tanner and executive vice-chairman Malcolm Hoenlein hailed the United Nations for marking the repeal.

"Israel and Zionism face continuing attempts to denigrate them," they said. "We are especially pleased that this event was under official UN auspices, reminding those who seek to perpetrate this travesty that the world community rejects it."

Israelis watch with delight as Parker makes good in NBA

By JERRY MITTLEMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Israeli basketball fans have been watching Anthony Parker's success with the Toronto Raptors with pride, surprise and delight, but they're also still waiting for a native-born son to make it in the NBA.

The 31-year-old Parker has made a silky, smooth transition from Euroleague superstar with Maccabi Tel Aviv to important member of the improving Raptors. Parker, a fixture in the Raptor's starting lineup since the beginning of the season, is Toronto's third leading scorer, averaging almost 12 points a game, and one of the reasons it is in strong contention for a playoff spot in the NBA's Eastern Conference.

The personable Parker was a popular figure with Maccabi fans during his five seasons with the team. Though he is a native of Illinois and no longer with Maccabi, the Israeli sporting public still takes a personal interest in his NBA exploits, which are mentioned on a daily basis in the local media.

Parker's successful transition to the NBA stems from a combination of talent and luck in comparison to fellow former Maccabi teammates Maceo Baston and Sarunas Jasikevicius, who are both still looking to make their mark.

Parker, as opposed to Jasikevicius and Baston, had at one time been considered a future NBA star. After an outstanding junior year at Bradley University, he was considered a probable lottery pick. But a less impressive performance as a senior made him less attractive to NBA scouts, and he was only the 21st player selected in the 1997 draft.

After two injury-plagued seasons with Philadelphia, Parker was out of the league and on his way to Europe, seemingly another case of a talented player whose NBA career falls through the cracks and winds up a European league lifer.

But Parker's scenario turned out differently. First, he reached the heights of European basketball, helping Maccabi to three Euroleague titles and grabbing several MVP trophies along the way. Now, even more amazingly, he has returned to the NBA after a seven-year hiatus and become a significant player.

Parker has also been fortunate to join a team like the Raptors, where new general manager Bryan Colangelo and his assistant, Maurizio Gherardini (formerly Benetton Treviso's GM), are trying to assemble a Phoenix Suns East-Euroleague West type squad. The Raptors have five Europeans on their roster and often start three. Parker, who thrived in Maccabi's ball-movement, team-oriented style of play, is a good match for this team.

Parker's success with the Raptors is no fluke and, ironically, his years with Maccabi gave him good preparation for the evolving stylistic changes in today's NBA.

JVS Toronto bowl-a-thon to help youth

JVS Toronto will hold its fourth annual Youth Services Bowl-a-thon on March 1.

The bowl-a-thon, to be held at Playtime Bowl, 33 Samor Rd., near Dufferin Street and Lawrence Avenue, will raise funds for programs and services that benefit at-risk youth and young newcomers to Canada, while underwriting training initiatives and entrepreneurship programs.

The JVS bowl-a-thon also promotes visibility of the agency's services, encourages community support and fosters the spirit of partnership, JVS announced. More than 5,000 young people benefit every year from JVS services.

For more information, contact Jo Michaels at 416-787-1151, ext. 29, or at jmichaels@jvstoronto.org.

Maccabi Tel Aviv's Israeli experiment a flop

By YOAV BOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd. ®

Maccabi Tel Aviv Chair Shimon Mizrahi likes to say his team "represents Israel," but for years the connection between the state of affairs at Maccabi and that of Israeli basketball has been tenuous at best. This season, there is a symbiosis between the two. Both are a flop.

A couple of factors were at play this season in favour of Maccabi's Israeli hoopsters:

- The weak American signings;
- Maccabi coach Neven Spahija likes Israeli players.

"I look at a player's quality, not his passport," Spahija said at the start of the season, when he gave almost unlimited credit to forward Lior Eliyahu and guard Yotam Halperin.

The inclusion of the duo as starters in Spahija's roster surprised many, but as the season progressed it became clear the Croat, unlike his predecessor Pini Gershon, doesn't think American players are necessarily better than local hoopsters.

The fact that most of the Israeli players haven't seized their chance is one of the sad things about Maccabi's season.

Eliyahu and Derrick Sharp are the exception. Eliyahu has had a breakthrough season and is playing the best ball of his career. Sharp is only Israeli through marriage, but Eliyahu is a bona fide blue and white talent.

One player who was supposed to have stood out alongside Eliyahu is Yotam Halperin. However, the guard has failed to fulfil the promise he showed with Slovenia's Olimpija Ljubljana last season. Halperin's output has been the lowest in the team per minute, and the combo guard has fallen out of favour with Spahija. "Goran Jeretin is our starting guard," Spahija said last week. The Croat seems to have despaired of Halperin even more than of Will Bynum.

Eliyahu and Halperin are opposing poles when it comes to Spahija's Israeli experiment. The ability shown by Yaniv Green, Sharon Sasson and Jamie Arnold shows why Maccabi's season is more like Halperin's than Eliyahu's.

With Gershon, Sasson showed glimpses of his shooting ability, but this season he has returned to being an insignificant player on Spahija's roster.

Green's case is even more saddening. The most talented Israeli centre has failed abjectly to take advantage of Maceo Baston's departure, Noel Felix's weakness and Arnold's instability. As for Arnold, he is surely sorry that he turned down the Spanish Tau Vitoria's generous offer last summer. The naturalized forward made a strong start to the season, but his ability has since gone downhill.

Almost Famous

By Jacob Medjuck

Somehow Purim became associated with the idea of costumes, which I of course remember wanting to sew myself (a hobby that I fruitlessly hoped would earn me a non-existent scholarship in home economics).

The Purim story of Queen Esther is contained in my second-favourite megillah (Kohelet is No. 1). There's nothing like a good story, and the five megillot are chock full of pulp attraction.

What's most interesting is the possibility that someone reading this is discovering that Megillat Esther is not the only megillah. How then did four others slip out of popularity? The answer: marketing.

How important is marketing? Consider this: movie trailers are now more scrutinized by their distributors than the films they promote. I rented an interesting film recently, Idiocracy. In execution, its humour was mostly broad and sophomoric, though its satirical structure was honorable. Notably, it had an opening premise about the future that was wickedly smart and well observed, but its cinematic merits are not what make this film a remarkable study.

The film stars Luke Wilson, a bankable Hollywood actor, and 20th Century Fox – which, it's fair to say, knows something about making movies – produced it. The budget was $30 million, which translated into a polished visual piece, and it was written and directed by Mike Judge, the very successful creator of Beavis and Butthead and King of the Hill, two pioneering animated comedies.

So why hasn't anyone heard of this major motion picture? Why did it make its debut at the video store? The movie certainly carries itself better than others released theatrically in the same genre. The answer will mystify you.

Fox was unable to make a trailer for the film that made the movie look as funny as it actually was. Without a marketing campaign to carry the picture, there was no confidence that audiences would flock to theatres – an absolute requirement for a studio theatrical release. And so a prominent assemblage was put to pasture.

Marketing a movie theatrically often costs $20 million to $30 million dollars. Studios need assurances that the advertising works before coughing up further investments – so much for "inner beauty" or "content is king." The whole thing just makes me want to do more sit-ups. Marketing is the new right hand of the Lord, and the bottom line is moving product.

Going to the theatres used to be an event for me. But a time is quickly approaching when younger audiences will not attach the same significance to going out to see a film in its theatrical first-run release. A DVD première will be socially acceptable, and, even more importantly, financially relevant for distributors. My knee-jerk reaction to this trend has aged me somewhat, echoing my father's first reactions to rap music. In my universe, what we call "direct to DVD" has the stink of being second rate. But attitudes change with each generation, and the quality of entertainment premiering on home video is improving dramatically.

A side effect of this to consider is that for the Academy Awards, a film must have a theatrical run in certain cities for a minimum period to qualify for consideration. We can't blame the corporate dollar for following trends that maximize earnings, but if blockbuster films become the only movies that stand a chance to recoup their meteoric marketing and production costs, then the only films in theatres, and at the Oscars, will be Adam Sandler and laser-ninja fare.

The lesson to us as Jews – not all of our rich history comes prepackaged with holidays – is that before we decline into a robotic nation of High Holy Day shul attendees, we might benefit culturally from some deeper self-appreciation.

And the lesson for the four other megillot: market yourselves with costumed holidays – or get kosher with the notion of direct-to-shul-library-shelf releases.

Purim Sugared Almond Salad

A kick-back student conference

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Urban Writer

I recently spoke at a conference in Vancouver sponsored by the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students that was attended by students from Vancouver, Winnipeg, Lethbridge, Calgary, and other western campuses.

The event was titled LOUD, which stands for Live it, Own it, Use it, Do it. The objective was to encourage Jewish students to embrace their Jewishness and act on it.

The conference participants were warm and laid-back, with a very strong sense of community, Judaism and Israel. As one of the participants said, when you're one of the only Jews on campus, you are thrust into the position of being an emissary for the Jewish people and our homeland.

The itinerary was well-balanced and included programming on Israel, Jewish involvement in politics, tikkun olam and Torah study.

All of the participants took part in a tikkun olam program, including a walk along East Hastings Street (a very angry area) to give out food to the homeless.

A genocide panel was held on Saturday night following a funky, New Age Havdalah service. The panel included a Holocaust survivor, a leader of the Sudanese Canadian community, a student representing STAND (formerly known as Students Taking Action Now: Darfur, a university-based committee that's fighting the atrocities in Sudan) and me.

Robbie Waisman, who survived Buchenwald, spoke about his experiences during the war – about the family he lost and the evil he witnessed. He spoke of how he would lie in his bunk at night in Buchenwald listening to older people speak about how the world would one day be peaceful after witnessing such evil. He said he remembered hearing this and being so excited that he would live in a utopian world. "Unfortunately, that has not been the case," he said, citing the atrocities currently happening in the Darfur region of Sudan.

There was Torah aplenty at LOUD, including a workshop on Kabbalah by Rabbi Yosef Saltoun. I gave a one-hour class on the Jewish approach to being a ba'al chesed (a good person), based on an article written by Rabbi Benjamin Hecht (of Nishma.org). A healthy discussion ensued about the formula for giving, the sentiment involved and what one should experience when helping others.

The LOUD conference was full of heart, and I wish more students would take advantage of such opportunities. In fact, one of the greatest challenges in the Jewish world today is attracting Jewish students to campus activities and conferences such as LOUD. This challenge is not exclusive to Western or Eastern Canada. It exists in Toronto as well. Jewish student professionals at Hillel will tell you that although there are more than 10,000 Jewish students in Toronto, a small percentage of them attend or play a role in Jewish campus programming.

LOUD was also full of pride – pride for Israel and the Jewish people. My hope is that the students who took part in LOUD – and in fact every Jewish student – will carry on that pride, and hold their heads high on campus and never, ever, be afraid to express his or her Jewishness or love of Israel.

This is another challenge facing Jewish leaders as many of our students feel threatened by growing anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment on campus. A number of student leaders told me that they will often mute the Israel and/or Jewish component of programming so that it won't be a deterrent to students.

(Mike, a participant and student from Calgary, inspired me, however. His friends told me he knows some Arabic, and will stand up proudly against Arab students who express negative statements about Jews or Israel in their mother tongue. According to his friends, Arab students are surprised that he does this, because, they say, most Jews are too frightened to challenge them).

LOUD was a fine testament to the Jewishness, warmth and kick-back attitude of our brothers and sisters to the West. Nice job!

Editorial

New ideas, as a rule, take time to be implemented. Ideas that were the catalysts for some of the articles in this supplement represent trends that are still in the process of emerging.

Consider these, especially if they have yet to hit your personal radar screen.

Stacy Markin, the mother of a special needs child and an advocate for special needs kids, writes a moving account of her efforts to help young students understand the challenges faced by people with special needs. Her gentle but straightforward approach is part of an ongoing effort to sensitize people and integrate those with special needs into mainstream society as much as possible. The trend has gained momentum over the past decade or two, but as Markin points out, the change that is effected often comes about slowly, one person at a time.

Another emerging trend is the growing involvement of grandparents in their grandchildren's lives. In this supplement, we examine how that trend – which incorporates both financial and personal involvement – is filtering down to Jewish day schools.

Sheri Shefa takes a fresh look at the "gap year" – a year away from school, usually before starting university – and why it hasn't caught on in Canada as it has in some other countries, while Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf writes that plans are in the works to offer vocational programs at the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, an idea that is slowly gaining credence in Jewish academic circles.

Also, Paul Lungen asks whether Jewish schools make the grade in a report that discusses standards of quality in education.

We hope the articles in Live & Learn 2007 will give you much to consider.

Grandparents' involvement on the rise at Jewish schools

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In February 2006, Leo Baeck Day School launched a Nachas Club for grandparents and special relatives. It kicked off with two Kabalat Shabbat services at the school's Thornhill branch, one of which was hosted by actor Harvey Atkin, and one at the southern branch of the school, hosted by Toronto Jewish community leader Toby Feldberg.

Both hosts have grandchildren at the school.

Grandparents have always been welcome at school events, but their involvement was not formalized until last year, says Leo Baeck's director of development, Elysa Greisman.

However, grandparents' involvement at Jewish day schools – not least their financial involvement – is a trend that has begun to receive more attention in the past few years.

At a 2004 conference run by the U.S.-based Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE) in October 2004, one session was devoted to "Grandparents as partners in growing the day school enterprise." A program blurb encouraged participants to "explore ways in which grandparents can be more significant supporters of day schools and schools can see them as more intimate and critical partners."

In July 2005, the New York Times ran an article titled "Financially set grandparents keep families afloat, too."

At Leo Baeck, where a steering committee for the Nachas Club met for the first time in September, the school encourages grandparents not only to give financial support if they can but to volunteer as well.

The school is "working really hard to make sure it's not just the financial" aspect, Greisman said, citing grandparent volunteers and upcoming Nachas Club events. Grandparents are being encouraged to "support the school in the way you can."

However, she admitted, Leo Baeck is "hoping to expand our donor base… It's one of the purposes but not the main purpose."

"We would hope grandparents would be giving – those that can in the way they can – to support the day school as well. Day schools, like any other private school, in order to be responsible, each have to have their own fundraising programs. Tuition usually does not cover the entire cost. As generous as UJA [Federation of Greater Toronto] is, each school has to take on that responsibility. To strive for excellence costs money."

Today's grandparents more active than the previous generation

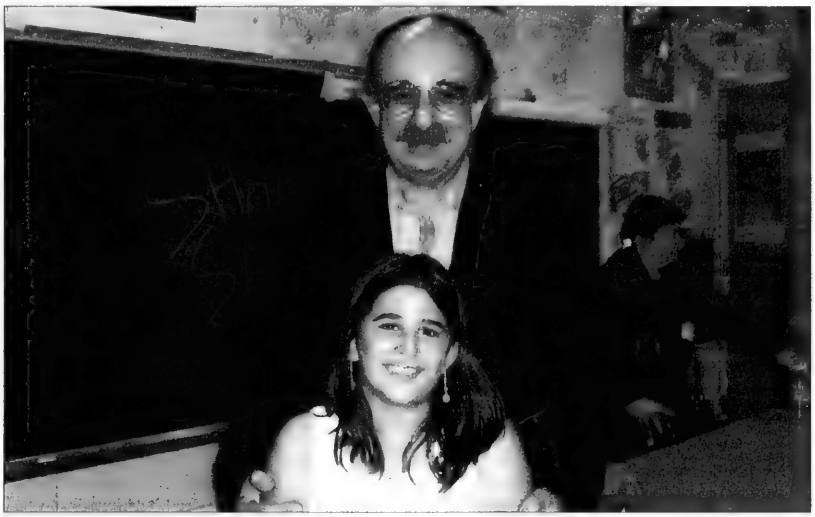
Reaction from families to the financial aspect has been mixed, Greisman said. "And that's honest. I think it's a learning curve, just like anything else... Should we be asking? How should we be asking? When should we be asking? Grandparents are of different means and different circumstances... We've asked for donations. We haven't identified a specific amount. We have asked for grandparents to come forward if they can. We have a tribute-card program."

At the Toronto Heschel School, which celebrated its 10th anniversary last year, there has been outreach to grandparents "since day one," albeit not in a systematic way until recently, according to principal Gail Baker.

In the past year, the school has had a couple of events just for grandparents, one being a reception immediately before they joined their grandchildren for a Chanukah celebration. The separate grandparent meetings were geared to inform them about school news and philosophy.



Actor Harvey Atkin, seen with his granddaughter Amanda, is involved with the Leo Baeck Day School Nachas Club for grandparents.

Also, grandparents have been asked for donations as part of larger fundraising campaigns, but personal involvement is more of a focus, said Baker, noting the importance of generational continuity.

"We will ask parents, 'Can we call your parents and invite them to something?' Sometimes they say yes. Sometimes they say no," she said.

"It's a very sensitive issue," she acknowledged, adding that a number of grandparents have taken the initiative and approached the school about donating money.

Others have volunteered "in a serious way" at the school, such as reading with kids or working in the school's organic garden.

"We want to model that to the kids. These are people of the utmost value, not just from a financial point of view, but they have a history to tell," said Baker.

Today's grandparents tend to be more active members of society in general than those of the previous generation, with more of a desire to be involved, she noted.

In terms of philanthropy, she added, "people want to give to something of social value. That's a shift I didn't see 10 years ago. They want to see their monies going to do something that will better the world, even if it's in a small school. They want to support that."

Atkin, who has three grandchildren currently at Leo Baeck, confirms that the financial aspect of grandparent involvement can be a delicate issue. "In some cases, I don't like it," he said of schools asking grandparents for donations, noting that grandparents may already be paying their grandchildren's tuition.

At a 2005 CJN roundtable discussion on communal and spending priorities of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, federation president Ted Sokolsky said that "a huge number" of tuition receipts are made out to grandparents.

Mark Smiley, educational director of Associated Hebrew Schools, estimates that in the greater North American Jewish community, between 20 and 40 per cent of grandparents "are assisting in a major way" with their grandchildren's day school education tuition.

In terms of fundraising, Associated is "moving more in the direction" of asking grandparents and alumni for financial support, he said, noting that the two groups sometimes overlap at the 100-year-old school. Thus far, he said, response has been positive, and he has found it "uplifting" to get support from a group who may not initially realize that the school needs funding.

Last year, Gerda Frieberg, an Associated grandparent, made a donation to the school that was described in a newsletter as "momentous" (the amount was not specified). The initiative was partly hers, and partly the school's, said Smiley.

Like other schools, Associated includes grandparents in many celebratory programs, Smiley said. He made a point of singling out grandparents to honour them at last year's school graduation.

One of the reasons that grandparent initiatives are relatively new at Jewish schools, Smiley said, is the Holocaust. "We grew up in an era where you couldn't assume children had grandparents."

Atkin noted that grandparents today may also have more time for their grandchildren than previous generations did.

His relationship with his five grandchildren is very different from the one he had with his own Russian immigrant grandfather. "My grandfather sat and learned, and you didn't bother him," he recalled.

Today, he said, "it's a whole different ball game."

Double cohort students compete for graduate school spots

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It's been four years since the last Grade 13 students and the first graduates of the four-year high school curriculum in Ontario were competing to get into university at the same time.

And now, the double cohort students are preparing to deal with the same problem as they apply to graduate schools.

Paul Hertz, a fourth-year biomedical sciences student at York University, has applied to five medical schools across Ontario – University of Toronto, University of Western Ontario, Queen's University, McMaster University and University of Ottawa. He said that some students may be unaware of the challenge of competing with more students for spots in graduate programs.

"I don't think so many people realize that it is an issue, but it definitely is. Just look at the number of applications that schools have received – it has gone up by anywhere between 20 and 25 per cent since last year," he said.

"I think the provincial government was estimating that it could be as high as a 30 per cent increase in applications this year," said Robert Tiffin, York's vice-president, students.

Hertz said that even he didn't start thinking about the increased number of applicants until recently.

"I'm really only thinking about it now that I'm waiting to hear back because I just don't think that many people have noticed that we're dealing with the same issue four years later. It definitely is a problem because there are not enough spots available and [there are] a lot more graduating students… Spots may have increased slightly, but nowhere near enough," Hertz said.

In an attempt to meet the needs of the double cohort students, the provincial government will provide Ontario colleges and universities with about $240 million a year to create 14,000 new graduate spaces by 2009, compared to the number four years ago.

In 2005-06, Ontario colleges and universities received about $211 million from the Quality Improvement Fund, which is part of a plan that will invest $6.2 billion more in the province's post-secondary system by 2010.

To qualify for the fund, each school signed a multi-year accountability agreement with the province indicating what their enrolment plans are for undergraduate as well as graduate students.

Paul Hertz

"Graduate growth is going to be a significant issue because it does draw on more resources, and as you increase the number of graduate students, there is a need to provide financial support for those students. There is also an increased demand on resources such as the library. Even making sure that we have sufficient office space for our graduate students is going to be an ongoing issue across the system," Tiffin said.

"We recognize that the government has made a significant investment to try to address this, and all the institutions are trying to partner with the government to make sure we can achieve these goals."

Tiffin said that being able to accommodate the dramatic boost in applicants is a concern, but there are many factors to consider.

"For example, in our MBA program, normally we ask applicants to have one or two years of business experience before they apply, so that would essentially rule out many of the cohort students who are graduating this year," Tiffin said.

"But for the other programs, we are seeing anywhere from 15 to 25 per cent increases in applications. By the same token, we have also increased the number of spaces available for graduate students," he said.

"This past fall, we took in about 1,418 full-time master's students and 255 doctoral students. In total, we have about 4,800 graduate students," Tiffin said, adding that there will be about 400 more graduate spaces at York next fall, primarily for master's programs.

> 'Graduate growth is going to be a significant issue because it does draw on more resources'

The Toronto Star reported that U of T has seen a 15 per cent jump in graduate applications for the next school year and has plans to create 2,100 more spots, for a total of 10,060 full-time spaces by September.

Tiffin said York has already experienced an increase in its graduate programs with the "pre-double cohort students" – those who fast-tracked through high-school to graduate in 2002 to avoid the double cohort in 2003.

He said schools in Ontario have been preparing for this for the past three years.

Although he couldn't provide a number, Tiffin said his school has been increasing the number of faculty members since 2001 in anticipation of the double cohort, and many of the faculty are also qualified to teach graduate courses.

Despite the efforts being made by post-secondary institutions and the provincial government to minimize the effect this transition will have on the thousands of graduate school hopefuls, some may have to postpone their goals for another year.

Hertz said that if he isn't accepted into any of the five Ontario medical schools for next fall, he'll cast a wider net and apply to out-of-province schools and even schools in the United States next year.

"If it doesn't work out for me this year, I'm just going to take a year off and work and relax and do some travelling and just apply again next year for sure," Hertz said.

Learning disabled students find support at universities and colleges

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When he was a student at a Jewish day school, Adam (a pseudonym) could not focus in his class of 30 children. If he was asked questions during discussions, he could not answer correctly.

"Kids called him stupid," his father recalled.

In Grade 2, Adam was assessed as learning disabled (LD). Today, he is excelling at York University, which provides the learning accommodations he requires.

Adam is one of many LD students who have successfully made the transition from the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (TanenbaumCHAT) to university, says Judit Kenyeres, head of the learning centre (a special education/remediation program) at the school's south campus. Before entering TanenbaumCHAT's special education stream, Adam – who graduated with an A average – was in the special education program at Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School.

Under the provincial Human Rights Act, universities and community colleges are obligated to provide educational support to LD students, says Carol Morton, a guidance counsellor who works closely with LD students at TanenbaumCHAT's south campus. She explains that this support can include a range of accommodations, including oral testing, assistance with note-taking, tutoring, assistive technology and/or extra time for writing exams.

While students with special education needs also represent a significant group within the public school population, it has only been in the last decade that support services at the post-secondary level have become widely available in Ontario, says Marc Wilchesky, chair of York University's Counselling and Development Centre and head of the centre's learning disabilities program (LDP).

Wilchesky has been running the LDP at York since its inception 22 years ago. "It was the first program of its kind in Canada," he says. "Back in 1985, people were thinking that kids with learning disabilities did not have the potential to go on to university."

He says applicants to York can inform the school of their learning disability during the admissions process or they can contact the LDP after they get accepted.

However, he stresses that students themselves must speak with staff at the centre to get the support services – they need to hone their self-advocacy and negotiating skills. "Professors will not talk to parents. The policy of the university is to communicate with students."

There is a parent orientation at the beginning of the school year, he adds. "Students get a letter, and it's up to them if they want their parents to attend a separate orientation."

He says sometimes students don't identify themselves to the LDP until after the term starts and they're too late to take advantage of supports like the degree credit course to improve reading and writing skills or Project Advance, an intensive six-week summer course designed to ease the LD students' transition to university.

However, other services, such as assistance from a writing tutor, time management, a study strategies program and accommodations for writing exams can be arranged, he says.

Wilchesky recommends a reduced course load for LD students because with fewer courses, they can more easily keep up their grade point average.

He says that sometimes the centre must advocate on behalf of students who do not identify themselves initially and end up getting low marks.

"There's an appeal process for grades if they didn't get the help they needed. They lose credits, but they won't have a sea of Fs."

Advocacy is also an important role for Accessibility Services at the University of Toronto, says Pearl Levey, an LD specialist who works there part time as well as in private practice.

Once the students are registered, the office contacts their professors about such matters as administering exams, negotiating assignment extensions or finding alternative test formats.

"We have to make sure that what they're testing is not compromised," Levey says. "We want to put people on a level playing field and not give them an unfair advantage."

Levey encourages students financially eligible for the Ontario Student Assistance Program to apply for the LD bursary. The $10,000 covers tutoring, assessments and a range of adaptive technology such as Kurzweil 3000, software that converts text to speech. "It's a lifesaver for students with reading problems."

She also suggests that incoming students consider taking Ready Set Go, a summer transition course for incoming students with disabilities.

Some students don't discover their disability until they reach university with its heavy workload, Levey says. "They come to university, and suddenly they have to cope with a lot of reading and independent learning.

"Initially they may not want to contact us. Then things start to fall apart."

Many of the LD students go on to graduate school, and those who demonstrate problems with processing speed are eligible for "reasonable accommodations" for such admission tests as the Law School Application Test (LSAT), she says.

"We see students from every faculty, including all the professional faculties like engineering, law and medicine."

Why subject your 5 year old to a big school environment, when you can give them the best of both worlds.

Mom builds bridges of understanding for daughter with special needs

By STACY MARKIN
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

Before my daughter Shayna was born 11 years ago, I would never have believed the path God had in store for our family. Nor could I have envisioned the journey we were about to embark on.

Our dear, first-born child has "special needs," including global developmental delays and autism.

As a mother, I have come to terms with my daughter's needs, and accepted her for the wonderful little girl she has become, in part through therapies she has received at Zareinu Educational Centre.

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto, where Shayna's younger siblings are students, started a wonderful new program this year for grades 2 through 5 – the Mitzvah Corps, led by Associated teacher Maytal Helfand. It offers hands-on learning experiences about a specific mitzvah each week. Through this program, I was recently able to spend some time bringing together Shayna's world and that of some of her peers at Associated.

In January, as a parent of a child at Zareinu, I had the opportunity to address the Mitzvah Corps, to open the students' eyes as to what it might be like to be or deal with a child with special needs.

I wanted to help the students understand that not all children have the same abilities, and that some need to attend a special school that accommodates their needs, where they can learn more efficiently and become the best they can be.

I took the students through a series of exercises to allow them to experience first-hand the frustrations people can feel when they are unable to perform simple tasks the rest of us take for granted. I wanted to help them understand the child who has special needs.

I gently blindfolded the students, and asked them to try to find their way to the door or to obtain a tissue, without the use of eyesight. I put two pairs of socks on their hands so that they could feel how hard it is to pick up coins to make a purchase when hands do not function well. Some students placed a bandage on their mouths and tried to communicate their thoughts to a friend.

The children began to understand how laughing at someone is hurtful and inappropriate. They learned to offer help, encouragement and understanding.

We watched a short video about Zareinu, allowing the children to take a look into a very different kind of school, but one where students who are just like them in many ways can learn.

The reactions and responses of the children made my short time with them very worthwhile and personally rewarding.

After the Mitzvah Corps session, I was especially touched by the children's written observations.

"Today Mrs. Markin came, and we did some really cool things with her," Reena Feldman, age 10, wrote. "First, she gave us blindfolds and we had to see what it was like to be blind. It was extremely hard. I couldn't even get a tissue! Next we used socks to try and pick up coins. That was tough! After [that], I put a bandage on my mouth and tried to tell my friends that I didn't know where the washroom was and needed it. It took three people before anybody understood me! I can't believe people have to do that every day!"

I truly believe that in less than an hour I accomplished a great deal with this small group of kids.

Anna Nabutovsky, age 7, wrote, "I learned that if you can't do stuff that other people can do, you are still the same."

Hanna Ziegler, age 9, wrote, "We learned what it's like to have special needs. It made me feel happy to know how I can help!"

Interestingly, there were several students in the group who had their own special needs. One child floored me when he proudly volunteered information about his own needs.

I was also moved when it was announced that the Associated student council had recently voted to make Zareinu their charity of the month. I was delighted that the children of Associated had banded together to help their peers at Zareinu.

Noam Golombek, age 9, wrote that he felt "sad, because some people can't do what I can. I want to try and raise all the money I can to help."

I felt that, in some small way, these children have a new perception.

Seth Kerzner, age 9, wrote, "Today we felt how hard it is to be different."

My message was sent. We are all, in our own ways, "different."

With the right type of help, the spirit of community and the desire to never say "never," all children can be the best that they can be.

My objective was to inspire, educate, and open the students' eyes to special needs, so that they would have a better understanding and not be afraid of the unknown.

What I learned from them was that they were interested in helping other children, and they had a newfound respect and understanding of "special needs."

When I reflect on the time I spent with the children of the Mitzvah Corps, I realize that my Shayna, who many felt would never accomplish much of anything, has accomplished a great deal without the use of any words (she is nonverbal). I am proud to be Shayna's mother. Her life does have meaning and she does make a difference, one person at a time.

Do Jewish day schools make the grade?

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Every year, the Vancouver-based Fraser Institute publishes its Report Card on Ontario's Elementary Schools, ranking more than 2,000 educational institutions based on results on standardized test scores taken by children in grades 3 and 6.

While all public and Roman Catholic schools are required to participate in the testing, administered by the province's Education Quality and Accountability Office (EQAO), only one Jewish day school regularly takes part – Bialik Hebrew Day School. And year after year, its students do pretty well. Last year, Bialik was ranked 105th out of 2,800 in tests that measured reading, writing and math. Over the past five years, the school's cumulative position was an impressive 85th in the province.

In publicly releasing its findings, the Fraser Institute stated that it hoped the Report Card will help parents evaluate the performance of schools and assist them in deciding where to send their children. By giving parents a set of criteria by which to measure school performance, the Report Card can help them press their schools to improve their offerings, the institute stated.

The EQAO testing, however, has no shortage of critics. Some say the tests don't measure all aspects of learning, while others say factors other than schooling affect test results, including family stability, parental involvement and expectations for students' success.

The Fraser Institute responds by noting that variations in results from school to school can't be accounted for solely by personal and family characteristics of students. "The more effectively schools enable all their students to succeed, the weaker will be the relationship between the home characteristics of students and their academic success," it asserts.

So how are parents to evaluate whether their children's schools are providing a good education? Is there an objective way to determine if the schools provide a quality education, or must they rely on anecdotal evidence from other parents and school officials?

In an evaluation of the Jewish day school system, a task force of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto urged last year that "quality must be at benchmark levels."

The report, titled The Way Forward: Report of the Task Force on Jewish Day School Education, was released in August 2006, and it made recommendations on improving the day school experience that an implementation committee is now considering.

The task force addressed four areas: structure, funding, marketing and quality. In an appendix to the report titled "Toronto Fact Finding," the task force described an "eroding quality of education." It attributed the erosion to "a shortage of qualified and/or competitively paid teachers; lack of sharing of best practices across the schools; and need for more diverse programming, particularly pertaining to special education.

"The quality issue is exacerbated by heightened parental involvement in their children's education and their increased expectations of accountability and communication by educators regarding the quality of education provided," the task force stated.

The Toronto Fact Finding section further reported that the task force had conducted focus groups involving parents with children in public, private and Jewish day schools. The majority possessed the financial means to send their children to day schools.

"For the most part, these parents are unclear or unconvinced as to the value of Jewish day school education." After noting the parents "have significant misperceptions" about day schools, including the quality of the system, the task force reported that the parents believed the schools needed, among other things, "a higher quality of teaching, inclusive of greater creativity and passion, and the need for better facilities."

On the question of quality, the task force made six recommendations.

It called on the federation – which in 2005-06 provided $7.8 million in tuition subsidies to parents and another $3.7 million in other aid to the day school system– to make "a significantly greater investment in strategies that will result in enhanced quality of day school education."

It called for "implementation of a quality review process at the individual school level for both general and Hebrew studies, conducted by a third party expert in school assessment, to measure school performance on a number of key dimensions and develop plans for attainment of benchmark levels of educational excellence."

Other recommendations called for improved school board governance, enhanced inter-school collaboration, and for the quality review to evolve into a school accreditation process.

So how exactly did the federation define quality? Were quality concerns at federation-supported day schools a factor in the 9.2 per cent drop (from 5,649 to 5,129) in elementary school enrolment since 2001? Was the drop a result of demographic changes? Or was it due to a migration of kids from schools affiliated with the federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) to other non-affiliated Jewish schools?

The authors of the report were unavailable for comment. All questions were steered to federation spokesperson Howard English, who rejected suggestions that the task force had significant concerns about quality in day schools. He acknowledged, however, that "the perceived quality of Jewish education can have a role in whether parents send their children to Jewish schools."

The BJE has for years fielded calls from some parents about their children's schooling, but those calls haven't increased dramatically in recent years, he said. "The task force believed the standards of quality in Jewish day schools system are generally high and the BJE believes that as well."

Nevertheless, he continued, the task force did recommend that "more objective standards" be developed "to measure the quality of Jewish education… in order for everyone, parents, schools, the BJE, to evaluate the quality of education in schools."

'Constantly striving to improve'

One Jewish educator was unequivocal in her assessment, saying the day schools are constantly striving to improve and provide a quality education to their children.

Yael Seliger, the BJE's vice-president for Jewish education and identity, said the task force section on quality assumes "the schools are not responsible enough. I don't buy that. The schools care a great deal about the quality they provide."

The BJE constantly monitors classes across the system, she said.

"I see some wisdom in making it more formal and not rely on our informal way of reporting," she conceded. But "to infer from here that this is a jungle out there is not true."

The BJE, whose future mandate and relationship to schools is being studied by the federation's task force implementation committee, oversees professional development of teachers and principals and provides "a whole array of services that enhance the quality of the teaching." It provides professional development to teachers; helps write curricula; assists teachers in presenting education about Israel; provides materials to supplementary schools and trains teachers in that system; provides continuing education to school principals; and promotes Jewish family education to enable parents to learn at home alongside their children, Seliger said.

She dismissed reliance on standardized testing as a means of parents gauging school quality. Instead, she recommended visiting a school, sitting in on a class, reviewing the curriculum and speaking to parents.

She did, however, agree with five of the task force's six recommendations, disputing only its suggestion that a third party be brought in to evaluate schools and give them accreditation.

That's a very expensive process and the accreditation body "does not do a damn thing to help the school rectify a problem. That's not good enough," she said.

"What's more important than standardized testing is a portfolio, the totality of a child's progress. You want a school to take you from A to Z. They're going to be able to identify the learning skills in the school itself and vis-a-vis the province."

Gail Baker is principal at the Toronto Heschel Day School. For part of the past year she has also served as chair of the executive committee of the Day School Principals' Association. The organization brings together day school principals about every six weeks to discuss issues of concern and common interest.

Baker said the task force did not interview any of the 30 members of the group, but the association has asked to make a presentation to the implementation committee before it reports.

Regarding the task force's concerns on quality, "we asked, is there a problem that people are citing or is it just that people are always trying to better themselves. All of us feel strongly that anything that can raise the quality of education, we're completely for that," she said.

"We are concerned with who will pay for the quality review process. It's very expensive."

What's more, she continued, "everybody sitting at the table is interested in improvement… One of my concerns is that I don't know what they mean by quality."

Baker said her view of educational excellence does not necessarily lend itself to quantitative measurement. She defined quality as "thoughtful learning, the ability to think and to transfer learning from one situation to another. That to me is excellence in education. It's not necessarily high marks in standardized tests. That spews back information without a lot of thinking."

Baker said if the implementation committee recommends tying financial incentives to outcomes, schools would face a disincentive to enrolling children whose first language is not English or who have special needs. Competition between schools could also lead to less co-operation.

Schools now share information, educational techniques, and best practices, and distribute materials between them. That could all change in a more competitive environment, she said.

Moishe Kesten is co-chair of the federation's implementation committee. He said the committee is dedicated to "making every school in the system better and to putting into place mechanisms that elicit striving for excellence as part of the system."

Kesten said the committee hasn't reached any conclusions about how that should be done, but he said the task force's recommendation for certifying schools presents difficulties. How do you compare schools which have chosen to present their Hebrew/Judaic content in quite different ways? It may be a heavy part of the program in one school and treated lightly in another, he said.

Kesten noted that day schools attract "a fraction" of the age cohort available. (Task force data indicated that in 2006, only 28 per cent of Jewish children in the available age cohort were enrolled in affiliated and funded day schools.) "We want to get more children into the system… so that every Jewish parent will think it is something they aspire to."

In addition to making a day school education more affordable and convenient, "top of the list is to make them excellent. If you make them excellent, they'll draw," he said.

One Jewish educator was unequivocal in his assessment of day schools – calling them "great schools." Mark Smiley, director of education at Associated Hebrew Schools, said the day school system produces students who "should far exceed any standardized test" administered to public school students.

Associated educates 1,713 students in three branches from nursery school through Grade 8. Smiley said "most day schools or all far exceed Ontario [curriculum] requirements."

"I think that's the goal of the Jewish day school movement nationally and internationally, to provide a product second to none.

"It is a tradition of having high academic standards and graduating hundreds of children into other academic programs," he said, noting that 90 per cent of his school's graduates go on to study at a Jewish high school.

'Goal is to provide a product second to none'

And further down the road?

"I don't think you could walk into an emergency room and not meet a graduate of day school," he quipped.

Associated administers its own reading and mathematics tests in Grade 6, and the school has done very well in national competitions. It also boasts good results in public speaking contests.

Results posted by the Canadian National Mathematics League show that among eighth graders in 2005-06, Associated finished 23rd out of 414 participating schools across the country. (The highest ranked student, however, was Mark Karantayer of Ohr Menachem Academy, a day school that serves the Russian Jewish community. The school finished sixth nationally in the contest.)

In the same school year, Associated Grade 7s were 16th nationally out of 465 schools and the Grade 6 class was 21st overall. (The Jewish People's Schools and Peretz Schools' Van Horne campus in Montreal finished third nationally, while the Calgary Jewish Academy was ninth in Region 1 in Alberta.)

Shana Harris, director of education at Bialik, which has just over 800 students from junior kindergarten through Grade 8, said the school has been participating in the EQAO testing for about nine years. It was introduced to provide "accountability to our school, parent body and our students" and to demonstrate teaching effectiveness.

In addition, the test data are analyzed to determine if there are any areas that need improvement, and if needed, resources will be invested in those areas.

"I think the parents like to know what the achievements of their children are," Harris said. "When we compare to public schools, they do it in six hours a day, we do it in three hours."

Test results are shared with parents and while she acknowledged the tests are only "a snapshot of the child's achievement," the school assesses progress in other ways. It surveys school graduates to see how well prepared they are."

Remediation programs are available if children are having difficulty, professional development is offered to teachers, and textbooks are brought up to date.

The school emphasizes instilling a "strong Jewish identity, and students will know their Jewish roots and be proud of being Jewish." Anecdotal evidence suggest a good number of graduates go on to Israel, where they continue their studies, Harris said.

'Kids who can cope in day schools can cope anywhere'

Not every parent who sends their children to day schools is satisfied with the education offered. Two parents of two different children, who requested anonymity, pulled their children out of day schools and have them now in a private school in a tony neighbourhood near the Bridle Path.

Crestwood School is a refuge for day school dropouts, they said.

The first mom, Joan (not her real name), took her daughter out of Associated when the combined general studies/Hebrew program "got to be too much."

"For some kids, it's great," Joan said. "They thrive in that environment. For us, we were constantly working to keep our daughter's head above sea level."

Joan regretted taking her daughter out of Associated, as she felt it did provide "a strong sense of Jewish identity."

But she said Associated, with its secular program crammed into fewer hours than the public school, couldn't offer the repetition and exercises her daughter received elsewhere.

At first, she enrolled her daughter at a local public school and she found the school was way ahead of Associated in math and more or less on par for the rest of the curriculum

Speaking with other parents, she found a common complaint. "If you're exceptionally bright, there are no resources for you. If you need extra help, they can't help you. These are not specialty schools."

Some of the teachers in the Hebrew program she felt were "old school" and somewhat "military" in style.

(The BJE's Seliger maintains that in the last six or seven years, the organization has begun addressing children with special needs and training teachers who deal with these children. About 30 teachers receive training each year at York University in this field, and schools have made strides in helping children who find the dual program difficult, she said.)

After a stint in public school, Joan moved her daughter to Crestwood, where the $17,000 tuition far exceeds that at day schools. Nevertheless, "there were a lot of Hebrew day school refugees at Crestwood," Joan said.

Ruth (not her real name) has her daughter at Crestwood after an unhappy experience at Heschel.

After four years at the school from junior kindergarten through Grade 2, her daughter was miserable. Ruth attributed it to the school's lack of organization, structure and discipline. She said the school administration was not responsive to her concerns and she felt her daughter was falling behind in reading. She hired a tutor for her daughter and learned several other parents were doing the same. Her younger son was also having trouble in the school.

Three years ago, she pulled her daughter out of the school and enrolled her at Crestwood. "A lot of kids left when we left," and she found at least eight other youngsters at the private school who'd given up on Jewish day schools.

Heschel principal Baker said it's not uncommon for some parents to be dissatisfied. "I'm not aware of any major move of parent dissatisfaction. I'm sure there are some individual parents who aren't happy."

The school's enrolment stands at 301 youngsters from junior kindergarten through Grade 8, and the number has been fairly stable over the years, she said.

Dov Goldberg has three children enrolled at Associated. He is "generally happy with their education, but there are challenges."

Goldberg said class discipline has been a problem, resulting in children not being able to learn.

He also has found a wide discrepancy in teacher's abilities and a resulting major difference in his children's enthusiasm for learning from year to year.

Nevertheless, Goldberg has no intention of removing his children from the school. "We consider Associated the best of the alternatives. We want a Jewish education."

Goldberg, who spends more than $30,000 a year on tuition, believes if he spent the same amount at a private school, his children would get a lower student-to-teacher ratio, more non-academic activities such as music and sports, better facilities and a better general studies education.

Sarah Burakowski is a veteran public school educator in York Region. "We have a lot of kids coming from day schools," she said. "A lot haven't been able to cope…Many are categorized as exceptional," which could mean they are particularly gifted or have learning disabilities.

Burakowski said learning disabilities are "a cognitive thing" and a child's difficulties do not necessarily mean they were receiving a poor education.

"I think quality [in Jewish day schools] is excellent," she said. "Don't forget you have to cover two languages. It's hard. Not every child can cope with that level of education."

Burakowski has friends who teach in the day school system and she has seen lots of kids who studied there. "I think you develop better work habits, better structure as you have to get through more work," she said. "The kids who can cope in day schools can cope anywhere."

A strong proponent of public schools, Burakowski said the general studies program at public schools is at least as good as at day schools. "If parents send their children to day schools, it's for a Jewish education, not a better education."

'Gap year' offers youths experience outside the classroom

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Taking a "gap year" to work and volunteer abroad, or just travel the world, is seen by educators and career counsellors in the United Kingdom as an experience that can help young people become more resourceful, more mature and gain independence.

So, why isn't this trend encouraged in Canada?

While some Canadian students may opt to take a year off in between high school and university, there tends to be a perception among educators and parents that deferring a year of school is a deferment of responsibility. Some worry that taking a year off could deter a student from returning to school, said Aino Lokk, the employment counsellor at Ryerson University's career centre.

She noted that some students don't want to prolong the education experience, either.

They "feel that they would not like to extend their education by any length so as to better position themselves for employment or further studies," she said, adding that the cost of taking a gap year is also a factor.

But in the United Kingdom, many students see a gap year as a given, as common as it is for North Americans to take a summer-long backpacking trip through Europe.

In an article that appeared in Verge Magazine, an online publication, in 2003, 10 Canadian universities were asked whether a student could apply for admission and take a year off before attending. Only two universities – the University of Toronto and the University of Regina – gave students the option to defer admission, with no strings attached.

David Gibson basks in the sun in the Atacama Desert in Chile during his 2005 gap year.

Alison Withers, editor of The Gap Year Guidebook, said that young students as well as those who have already begun a career can benefit from taking a gap year.

"It's a chance to step back and take a fresh look at life, to experience another culture in a way that you don't on a shorter vacation, to challenge yourself and learn to deal with situations you wouldn't normally face," Withers said.

Lokk said that the trend may be catching on in Canada.

"I think more students are starting to realize the value of global experience, both from a personal as well as professional growth perspective."

"For young people, it's often a chance to pause between high school and university, or university and work, to travel and have an adventure. 'Career-breakers,' typically in their mid-30s, are also looking for time out from the rat race, having felt they were getting into a rut. Sometimes this leads to a change of career, but also to being refreshed and more innovative if they go back to their previous one," Withers said.

She said that younger people tend to travel to Australia, New Zealand and Thailand, but Africa is quickly becoming a popular option.

"More mature travellers tend to go for more unusual places, particularly Latin America and the developing countries in South Asia, especially India, where they feel they can do something worthwhile to make a difference. As for what they do, some just travel, others combine it with periods of working or volunteering. It's a very individual decision."

David Gibson, 23, who works at a medical marketing agency in London, England, is a 2004 biomedical science graduate from the University of Sheffield.

Gibson was so pleased with his experience taking a gap year in 2000 before he entered university that he opted to take another in 2005.

Chess is 'a great way of improving the intellect'

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Organizers of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education's (BJE) first-ever school team chess tournament say the inaugural event was a huge success.

"Chess is one of those media for creating an environment where mental acuity is valued," says Seymour Epstein, the BJE's executive director and the federation's senior vice-president of Jewish education and identity.

It's "one of these places where passion and motivation create a much better environment for ongoing learning," he said.

"You should have seen the kids at the tournament. They were so engaged."

The idea for a Jewish school chess tournament germinated last spring in discussions with Janet Nish-Lapidus, principal of the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School and Joan Schoenfeld, principal of the Downtown Jewish Community School, said Ted Winick, president of the Chess Institute of Canada, who teaches chess classes at both schools.

The two principals initiated a meeting with Epstein, who gave the green light to go ahead with the tournament.

"The reason the BJE got involved is because we are always attempting to enhance the quality of learning," Epstein told The CJN.

The excitement generated by the tournament was heightened by the participation of a world-renowned chess master from Israel, Sophia Polgar.

Winick and the BJE's director of school liaison, Joel Kurtz, organized the December tournament, which drew some 60 students from seven Jewish day and supplementary schools from across the GTA.

Older students from the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, who were the only team in their category and automatically won their division, "quickly shifted into the roles of mentors and teachers and began helping the younger students," said Winick.

Their participatory spirit was one of the highlights of the afternoon, he said.

Winick added that, with the success of the first tournament, he is hoping to attract more children to the next one, since there are many Jewish children playing chess.

"The roots of chess in Jewish culture go back hundreds of years. The majority of rabbis have found that chess is a great way of improving the intellect and were in favour of the game," he said.

"Chess is a wonderful mental exercise," noted Kurtz. "It's a great tool for sharpening the mind. It's recognized that chess has benefits in improving analytical thinking."

Taking a gap year isn't all fun and games

"The first time, I spent a year in Canada, worked at a Pickle Barrel restaurant in Toronto and then travelled out to [British Columbia]. The second time, I bought an around-the-world ticket, and it was one big holiday. I started in China, and ended in Mexico via Australia," Gibson said.

"The experience helped me grow up. I'm more laid back now, more cultured and well-rounded. I learned more about myself. After travelling, you realize who you are because of all the different experiences you encounter."

But taking a gap year isn't all fun and games.

Withers said it is important for a "gapper" to decide how long he or she can afford to be away and to budget accordingly. It is also important to do a lot of research about what you want to do, whether you want to work abroad, do an internship, volunteer, travel, or combine these options.

"Research the places you want to visit thoroughly, prepare thoroughly, and if you want to organize a placement, use a reputable, experienced organization with in-country knowledge and representatives. Make sure you have the right visas, work permits and insurance," she said.

To offset the cost, do research about organizations that provide grants to students who want to take a gap year.

Gibson said that the only advice he has for someone who is considering taking a year off is to do it.

"Don't worry about getting a job when you get back. There's loads of options out there, and you'll still be plenty young enough."

Jewish camps nurture identity, contribute to continuity

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

During her last five fun-filled summers at Camp Ramah, Chanie Antfleck has loved many aspects of camp, but the one experience that stands above all others is celebrating Shabbat.

"It's my favourite part of the week," says the 16-year-old Toronto native.

"Being exposed to Kabalat Shabbat, with this whole oneg of singing, dancing and cheering is a funfest, and after it's done, I'm already looking forward to the next Friday."

Antfleck says that going to a Jewish camp has played a pivotal role in nurturing her Jewish identity, a feeling that isn't unique among Jewish camp attendees.

More than 60,000 kids and teens across North America attend Jewish summer camps, and many of these campers say their summertime experiences significantly shape their connection to Judaism and the Jewish community.

For instance, a study by a sociologist from Hebrew Union College's Jewish Institute of Religion found that about two-thirds of those who went to a Jewish camp said their Jewish identity was "very important."

Conversely, less than one-third of those who didn't attend a Jewish camp expressed the same sentiment.

"Camps build Jewish self-esteem," says Michael Wolf, director of Camp Ramah in Utterson, Ont.

"Everything we do at Ramah, whether it's services, classes or playing in the field, it's all about feeling [a Jewish connection] in your soul."

So what is it about camp that has such an effect?

"It's the special environment that camp offers where it allows Jewish kids to live Jewishly, 24/7," notes Jerry Silverman, president of the Foundation for Jewish Camping based in New York.

"At camp, kids can celebrate and live the joy of what it is to be Jewish."

Unlike the confines of a structured classroom or a formal synagogue service, kids at camp can pray and gain a Jewish education in an informal, relaxed setting.

"Think about davening the morning service while the sun rises over the lake," Silverman says.

"It brings to life Jewish values, and it's an amazing place for kids to really feel that it's cool to put on tfillin or sing Shabbat songs."

Following a decline in the late 1990s and early part of the 21st century, the number of kids attending one of the 130 or so Jewish camps in North America has risen.

However, even as the numbers climb, less than 15 per cent of camp-aged Jewish kids in North America go to Jewish camps.

Silverman says the Foundation for Jewish Camping endeavours to double the number of kids going to these camps and points out such an effort will contribute to Jewish continuity.

"Resident Jewish camping is one of the critical answers to the issues of identity and continuity," he says.

"It should be one on the priority list of the experiences we need to give children today."

Now that she's beyond the camper age, Antfleck won't be returning to Ramah as a camper this summer. She will, however, be linking up with her camp friends on a six-week odyssey to Israel and after that, guess where she plans on being?

Chanie Antfleck carries a 70-pound backpack on a Camp Ramah camping trip in Temagami Park last summer.

'More discussion' needed on community middle school

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The committee charged with implementing the recommendations of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's report on the future of Jewish day schools has yet to follow though on the report's funding recommendation No. 11.

Seymour Epstein

When it does, it will have several issues to consider.

The report urges that a study be done to determine the feasibility of a community middle school on the Lebovic campus being built in Vaughan.

"The first thing you'd have to look for" is whether parents want such a school, says Seymour Epstein, the federation's senior vice-president of Jewish education and identity.

The second thing is whether schools are interested, he added.

At least half a dozen Jewish day schools near or beyond the northern boundary of Toronto have their own middle schools. Associated Hebrew Schools alone has 533 students in grades 6, 7 and 8, making it the largest Jewish middle school in the world, according to the school's educational director, Mark Smiley.

Federation spokesperson Howard English told The CJN that a new community middle school, "in concept, could replace some of the middle schools that now exist."

The recommendation stemmed from the success of the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (Tanenbaum-CHAT), Toronto's Jewish community high school, English said.

David Prashker

The report's authors envisioned a similar middle school "in which kids of all backgrounds could learn together... and create mutual respect for kids from all backgrounds, and to find a common Jewish language, so to speak," he said.

Also, he noted, creating such a school would be "a matter of convenience, so instead of kids travelling to many different schools, it would be one central location on the Lebovic campus."

To a lesser extent, he added, there is a consideration of "financial efficiency.

"A lot more discussion has to take place," English said. "The task force understands that implementation really depends on consensus on the viability of the concept."

The proposed middle school would draw students from all the schools to be housed on the Lebovic campus, and perhaps from the rest of the community as well, said Moishe Kesten, co-chair of the implementation committee.

But it would require "the buy-in of all the schools," he added.

The committee is due to have its recommendations in place July 1, but it may delegate responsibility for the feasibility study to the body that is scheduled to replace the federation's Board of Jewish Education on July 1, if it's determined that the study will not be a "simple process," Kesten said.

When the original study was released last fall, Gail Baker, principal of the Toronto Heschel School, told The CJN that from a philosophical standpoint, a community middle school would be a mistake. She said that "a lot of research bears it out."

She added that her own school would be "greatly" affected by a new community middle school. "We have a particular philosophy and way of teaching that follows from JK to Grade 8."

David Prashker, director of Leo Baeck Day School, is also against the idea, although some other school leaders are waiting to see what the feasibility study reveals.

"We would be very unhappy with it," Prashker said, explaining that he is concerned such a move would affect Leo Baeck's economic, educational and social viability. Also, he added, the creation of such a school would only address the needs of the community north of Steeles Avenue.

Leo Baeck, like Associated, educates children from nursery through Grade 8. But unlike Associated, which has its middle school on a separate campus, Leo Baeck has all grades on both its Thornhill and Toronto campuses.

Prashker points out that Leo Baeck has an extensive middle school curriculum on Reform Judaism, as well as a budding International Baccalaureate program, which aims to help students become critical thinkers who care about local and world issues. The school was approved as a prospective member of the International Baccalaureate Organization last June for its middle years program. It is the only Jewish day school in Canada to offer the program.

Students "clearly wouldn't" benefit from those programs at another school, Prashker said.

If a community middle school were to open, Leo Baeck would not close its middle school "unless economic conditions forced us to," he said.

Smiley said that, "on one level, the concept [of a community middle school] has merit, when the schools realize that operating all the middle schools independently creates a financial burden that individual schools cannot bear.

"Theoretically there should be some benefits in terms of economy of scale, and on the other hand, that would need to be balanced [by] best practice on optimal sizes of schools. At some point, schools can become too big."

Live & Learn

Larger school might offer more diverse programming

However, Smiley said, "I think the idea of a community middle school would require all the schools to decide if they still wanted to be in the middle school business."

At Associated, he said, "my guess is we would study it carefully, and if it upheld the mission of our school, which is to have a Torah values-based community school, we would look at it."

Associated, which has students from a range of Jewish backgrounds, "sees itself to some degree as a community middle school," he added.

Even if there is an interest in a new community middle school, it would likely take time to become a reality.

"A community high school took decades to develop," said Epstein, referring to TanenbaumCHAT, which had to redefine itself in terms of perspective and ideology when it separated from Associated more than 25 years ago.

A community school "has to be a pluralist setting," Epstein pointed out.

"Middle school is a very complicated issue in its own right, never mind a community middle school," Epstein added. "[The students are] children who are adolescents."

Gail Freeman, Associated's middle school vice-principal and head of guidance, notes that middle school students have "so many different needs. They are developing academically, socially and emotionally."

Brian Klar, chair of the board of United Synagogue Day School, said that USDS, as a school, supports the exploration of the idea of a community middle school to see what the pros and cons would be. Like Leo Baeck, the Conservative Jewish school has a middle school at both its northern and southern campuses.

> Middle school would take time to become a reality

A potential benefit of a community middle school, Klar said, is the possibility of economies of scale when budgeting for big-ticket items such as computers and science labs. "There are critical issues in terms of affordability [of tuition]."

Although the numbers have not been crunched, he suggested that there would be pros and cons in that schools such as USDS would lose some of their income, but also some of their costs.

On the positive side, a larger school might offer more diverse programming, he noted. "Maybe there would be more specialized programming in different niche areas."

However, he added, middle school students are at "a critical age" around the time of their bar and bat mitzvahs. How to impart the Conservative Jewish philosophy embodied at USDS "has to be looked at" in the context of the proposed middle school, Klar said. "Part of the model would have to account for those sorts of things and have an approach that takes that into account.

"It may or may not be an idea that does succeed."

As to whether or not parents want it, Klar believes most are not even aware of the option.

Impact of Torah High lasts for years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Obtaining a high school credit may draw public school students to Torah High, an accredited after-school Jewish studies program administered by National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), but a recent study has found that students get far more than that out of it.

The program, which began in 2001 with 25 students, now has 375 students in 14 locations in the Greater Toronto Area.

Students attend one two-hour class a week, and have the option of attending Shabbatonim, cultural events, and religious trips and excursions.

Randal Schnoor

The study, prepared for NCSY, was conducted by Randal Schnoor, a sociologist at York University who specializes in contemporary Jewish life.

He said that "students may enrol for the credit, but they end up getting a tremendous amount Jewishly.

"Clearly, in a relatively short time, often just one year, Torah High made a strong Jewish impression on its students."

Schnoor found that over 60 per cent of students – more than half of all students had no Jewish day school education – reported that as a result of their experience in Torah High they exhibit a higher level of morality in their everyday life decisions; 37 per cent said that they now engage in more Jewish study out of personal interest; and 40 per cent said that they observe Jewish holidays more.

As well, he said, 30 per cent reported observing Shabbat more often, 27 per cent reported attending synagogue more frequently, and 23 per cent reported paying greater attention to kashrut.

"Most significantly, more than 70 per cent of respondents reported feeling a stronger sense of Jewish identity as a result of their experience.

"While students reported significant positive change in terms of religious behaviours, it was instructive to see that it was core Jewish attitudes and values, such as the importance of marrying Jewish and Jewish education, that showed the most profound change," he said.

Schnoor said that some students reported to him that they learned more in one year than they did in six years of supplementary Hebrew school and that they came to class eager to learn.

"Without Torah High, I would know nothing about Judaism, and may not [have thought about] marrying Jewish, going to synagogue or giving my children a Jewish education," said one respondent.

Others said that they intend to continue their Jewish education at university due to their experience at Torah High, Schnoor said.

With regards to the students' Jewish activities when they finished high school, Schnoor said they surveyed a small group of Torah High alumni and found that most reported a positive change in Jewish behaviours as a result of Torah High.

"This finding suggests that the Jewish impact on students made at the time of taking the program is sustained for at least a number of years after completing [Torah High]."

He said that one student told him, "Torah High was the beginning of my Jewish growth, like a spark that has resulted in me asking many questions and trying to better understand my Jewish heritage and what Judaism means to me."

Considering the fact that the most common reason respondents gave for enrolling in Torah High was to receive academic credit or spend time with friends, said Schnoor, "it is particularly striking to observe how much impact students report the program has made on their Jewish lives.

"Through a small sample of alumni we have some evidence that the Jewish impact of Torah High is not short-lived, but rather is sustained for a number of years after completing the program.

"Future longitudinal research is recommended with large samples of almuni to provide more definitive findings in this regard," he said.

Vocational training gains credence among community educators

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Jackie Mason once quipped, "When we were growing up, every Jewish mother wanted her son to become a doctor… If he was not so bright, then he could be a lawyer, and if he was even dumber, he could always be an accountant."

Vocational training? Not even on the comedian's radar.

While Mason's humour may be dated and not to everyone's liking (and somewhat disparaging to the noble professions above), the joke itself might reveal a sort of truism that has seemingly prevailed in the Jewish educational mindset: academic studies should be cultivated to the exclusion of almost everything else.

It also assumes that kids who aren't academically inclined aren't as intelligent as their learned peers.

Nothing could be further from the truth, says Paul Shaviv, director of education for the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (TanenbaumCHAT).

With more than 1,400 students across two campuses, it is one of the largest Jewish high schools in Canada.

"I think that for many years, the perceived aspiration of the Jewish community was for success via academic excellence," he said. "The last 10 to 15 years have seen much greater provisions and understanding within all sectors of the Jewish community that not every kid can be or wants to be, academic. We have to value every single student in our community equally."

The topic is a sensitive one among educators in a community where brain power has historically been valued over brawn.

But the idea that offering vocational training is important is slowly gaining more credence in Jewish academic circles, particularly at the high school level.

Paul Shaviv [CJN photo archives]

In a 2006 report on scholastic initiatives for the Jewish community, Tikun Chaim, a research body under the auspices of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, cited the need to develop "an alternative/vocational/co-op program within the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (TanenbaumCHAT) school environment."

It was envisioned that doing this would provide more opportunities for students who did not "qualify for the high academic programs at CHAT," while allowing them to "remain in a Jewish day school environment."

Shaviv said the idea goes back to 2002, when he presented a document to his school's education committee titled Workplace-Oriented Education Programmes In Jewish High School: Will We Be a World leader?

"CHAT made it policy that we wanted to extend our mandate, to make the Jewish high school experience accessible to the widest number of kids in the greater Toronto Jewish community," he said.

Beyond that, Shaviv fervently believes that the lack of vocational curricula to date has done a great disservice to the community, disenfranchising many of its youth.

"Every single student in our community should have access to the Jewish high school experience," he said. This rarely happens "because of the way the Jewish schools have been structured; they've generally had very heavy academic workloads. And that has, intentionally or unintentionally, excluded quite a number of kids. I don't think that's morally right. I don't think it's Jewishly right and I don't think it's educationally right."

While TanenbaumCHAT currently offers no vocational programs, Shaviv said that class and enrolment space has already been reserved for this purpose in the school's new campus in the Kimel Family Education Centre on Bathurst street, slated to open later this year.

TanebaumCHAT's vocational program is scheduled to commence in 2008, though specific curricula have not been finalized.

Isaac Hollander, head of social studies at Bnei Akiva Schools of Toronto, wrote to The CJN with a similar viewpoint.

"If we think differentiation is so important within arts and sciences, why do we ignore a more fundamental differentiation, that between the academic and vocational tracks?" he asked. "Surely education should be about opening options to our children, not closing them down."

Hollander, who himself took night courses to learn and practise jewelry-making and operates an artisan business outside his teaching hours, believes vocational training can be crucial for certain students who may need other career outlets.

While he admits there is limited room to provide courses of this nature in smaller schools such as his, he acknowledges that a change in attitude is necessary.

"There are many wonderful, honourable ways… out there of making a respectable living that our students have no idea about," he wrote. "We have an obligation, I believe, to minimize the likelihood of students waking up later in life and realizing, 'I never knew I could have done this. If only I knew it existed.'"

Modern principals no longer 'rule by fear'

'Society has evolved'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The role of principal has gone through a sea change in the past number of years, three Hebrew day school educators agree.

"The whole model for the educational leader has evolved from authoritarian to collaborative. That means less control and more empowerment," said Frieda Woznica, principal of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Richmond Hill campus.

Frieda Woznica

This type of leadership is reflected in the business world as well, Woznica said. "Society has evolved, and people are less willing to accept 'rule by fear.'"

Principals these days are visible and approachable to parents and students, she said.

"Kids want explanations, and we try to talk things through. Students' self-esteem is [a big issue.]"

At Bialik Hebrew Day School, Shana Harris, director of education, tries "to know the kids by name by being out in the schoolyard and regularly visiting classrooms. I want to be part of the school."

Her motto, she said, is to "connect with respect. That means student to student, teacher to student, principal to teacher, etc. That is how we work together to make the school a comfortable, nurturing, safe environment."

Shana Harris

As director of education, she said, she is anxious to know when kids do something well. "It may be that they have struggled with a subject and they have progressed. They're not the best or the worst in the class, but they've tried hard. I want to know about that. It is an opportunity to celebrate their success."

Ashley Waltman

Principals are now hands-on and visible, she said. "We want kids to know us, and connect to us as real people."

She keeps a treasure chest in her office, she said, "and when a student loses a tooth, they come in for a chat and a treasure. It's a special time for both of us, and I've found that even older kids come in."

Ashley Waltman, principal of United Synagogue Day School's Bathurst campus, spent 32 years in the public school system, the last few as principal of North Toronto Collegiate Institute.

"I have always felt that when kids leave a school, they should not remember the principal. The teachers are the ones who should be memorable. That sets the tone for the school."

He does enjoy meeting students, however, and looks forward to his informal hallway conversations, he said.

He also wants to know when a student does something well. "I want to see students when they succeed, even if that means a mark of 70 per cent. I believe in positive reinforcement. We get a lot further that way."

Some kids need stroking, he said. "They may not have the highest marks, but they've done their best. Students should be individually referenced."

JERUSALEM — Sheik Ra'ad Salah, speaking in Cairo last week, called on the Arab and Muslim world to begin every news broadcast with developments on and around the Temple Mount.

At a press conference convened in the Egyptian capital, the head of the northern branch of Israel's Islamic Movement proposed the creation of a charity that would raise money "to save Jerusalem from the Judaization attempts of the Israeli establishment."

The statements by Salah are part of the organization's declared campaign. Salah and his ally, Jerusalem Waqf (Supreme Muslim Council) head Sheik Ikrima Sabri met with Arab League Secretary General Amr Moussa.

An Islamic Movement delegation returned last weekend from Turkey, where members held talks with officials and began preparations for a reciprocal visit to Israel.

Sheik Ra'ad Salah

In Jerusalem, meanwhile, a power struggle is raging over the Temple Mount among the Palestinian Authority, Jordan, Israel, the northern branch of the Islamic Movement and other interested parties. One symbol of this struggle is the replacement last week of the longtime head of the Islamic Waqf religious trust, Adnan Husseini, with Azzam al-Khatib.

While the Jordanian supporters of Husseini, who is currently abroad, explained that the change of hands was routine – the result of the former head's retirement – it is obvious that the move has important political implications and is connected to the complicated relationship among the parties.

The position of Waqf head is the most important one in the web of control over Muslim assets in Jerusalem, the most significant of which are the Temple Mount and Al-Aqsa Mosque. The Jerusalem Waqf operates under the aegis of Jordan. In its peace agreement with the Hashemite Kingdom, Israel promised to maintain Jordan's special status regarding Islamic holy sites in Jerusalem.

The Jordanians have been trying for years to block all involvement by Hamas and the Islamic Movement in Al-Aqsa matters. Their attitude to Salah and his organization is shared by the PA, which a few months ago fired Sabri as mufti of Jerusalem due to his growing closeness with Salah, replacing him with Sheik Mohammed Hussein, who also enjoys Jordanian approval.

Israeli-Jordanian co-operation over Al-Aqsa has also increased recently. For example, for nearly two years the Israel Police have prevented several Palestinian figures from entering the Temple Mount, including Waqf employees identified with Hamas. The nations also co-ordinate their restrictions against Salah, whose activities at Al-Aqsa have made him popular throughout the Muslim world.

PRECIOUS CARGO DROPPED FROM THE SKY

A group of paratroopers set up an Aron Kodesh, the Holy Ark in which the Torah scroll rests. The soldiers were engaged in military exercises last week in the north of Israel. The Ark, which is reinforced with heavy materials to protect its precious contents, was manoeuvred into position on the field for the soldiers to use during prayer.

The News In Brief

CANADA

Y Polls On Windows

MONTREAL — The Park Avenue YMCA in Montreal says it will announce at the end of March whether it will keep the frosting on its windows. The Y is polling its 3,400 members on the windows, which made headlines last fall when it became known they were frosted at the request of a chassidic congregation next door, which paid for the work. The four windows, at the back of the building's second floor, are on a women's exercise room. The rear of the Satmar Yetev Lev shul and its yeshiva face the Y across an alley. The shul said the sight of women in fitness attire was distracting to its boys. The windows had been covered by blinds that wore out after 10 years. The frosting was put in last winter, but became a public issue after a member started a petition against it. The poll is being done by an independent firm.

Magazine Revamped

WINNIPEG — CanWest Global Communications, controlled by the Asper family, is revamping the New Republic after taking control of the venerable U.S title. CanWest plans to change the 93-year-old magazine's publishing schedule to every two weeks from weekly, but it will nearly double its size, and include more graphics. The redesign debuts March 19.

WORLD

'Spy' Denies Charges

CAIRO — An Egyptian Canadian man arrested on suspicion of spying for Israel denied the charges against him. Mohammed Attar, 31, appeared in a Cairo court Feb. 24 and was charged with spying for Israel while he lived in Turkey and Canada, in exchange for $56,000. Attar is also accused of homosexuality and converting to Christianity, both taboo in Egypt. He denied the charges, saying a confession he gave to Egyptian counter-intelligence agents was forced. Israel has also dismissed the case as baseless.

Art To Be Returned

BERLIN — Germany will return a Carl Spitzweg painting to the heirs of a German Jewish collector who died in Buchenwald. The 1857 work Fiat Justitia had been on display until last year in the presidential palace in Bonn. A government inquiry found that Leo Bendel was forced to sell it during the Nazi era and used the proceeds to help his family escape to Austria.

Conference Criticized

TEHRAN — A group of Iranian scholars wrote a letter denouncing a recent Shoah denial conference in Tehran. Some 20 academics, writers and artists, many of whom live outside Iran, circulated the letter on the Internet, saying the December conference was dangerous propaganda. "Those who perpetuate the discourse on Holocaust denial ignore the feelings of the people directly affected by this event. These people include, among others, a group of our Jewish fellow citizens in Iran." While the group repeated standard Iranian rhetoric about Israel's treatment of Palestinians, the letter argued that the issue isn't related to the Holocaust.

Text To Be Changed

SEOUL — The author of a South Korean educational comic book series said he'd change chapters on Jews that were criticized as anti-Semitic, but said the stereotypes are accurate. "The Jews are the invisible force that controls the U.S.," Lee Won-bok, a Seoul university professor, told Associated Press. "I wrote the chapter to let people know that you can't understand the U.S. without knowing the Jewish community." The comic book series, which teaches students about other nations, has sold more than 10 million copies since its 1987 publication.

Nation of Islam Touts Anti-Semitic Books

Louis Farrakhan

DETROIT — The leader of the Nation of Islam recommended anti-Semitic conspiracy tracts and former U.S. president Jimmy Carter's book to his followers.

The Anti-Defamation League said that Louis Farrakhan concluded his Feb. 25 Saviours' Day address in Detroit by recommending books that included The Secret Relationship Between Blacks and Jews, which claims the slave trade was dominated by Jews; The Secrets of the Federal Reserve, which claims the world's banks are controlled by Jews; and Carter's Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid, which alleges that Israel has set up a de facto apartheid system in the West Bank.

Copies of The Synagogue of Satan, a book written by a Nation of Islam member that says the world is being manipulated and corrupted by Satanic powers led by Jewish elites, were available for purchase at the event.

Party reps square off on Mideast policy

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

With a federal election looming, spokespeople for the three national parties tangled recently over differences concerning Canadian foreign policy and the Middle East.

Originally billed as a debate of Liberal leadership candidate Bob Rae versus unsuccessful Conservative candidate Peter Kent (St. Paul's), they were joined at Beth Tzedec Congregation by David Berlin, who took part at the request of NDP leader Jack Layton.

Rae, the former NDP premier of Ontario, questioned how Israel could be expected to negotiate with the Palestinian Authority when its Hamas-led government refuses to recognize the State of Israel.

He called on the Canadian government to "be more active supporting efforts to resolve the conflict… I know we are not active."

Rae said the current federal government appears content to take a back seat on the diplomatic front. That is a mistake, he contended.

"Canada has to put the reduction of conflict between countries at the heart of our foreign policy," he said.

A two-state solution is in Israel's interest, Rae continued, as a state would exercise a monopoly of power and patrol its borders.

Kent, the deputy editor of Global TV News, noted that the government of Prime Minister Stephen Harper acted decisively in suspending monetary transfers to the Hamas-led Palestinian government, and he said the prime minister was "courageously ahead" of Canadian public opinion during Israel's war with Hezbollah.

Harper rejected neutrality in that conflict, and Canada, he said, shouldn't "back away or water down our responsibility to the only democracy in the region," Kent stated.

He assailed the "duplicity" of the Liberal government of Paul Martin, arguing the former prime minister said one thing at a B'nai Brith dinner while instructing Canada's UN delegation to support a number of anti-Israel resolutions.

Berlin, who was born in Israel and served in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) during the Yom Kippur War, said that Canada's supporting of one or another government of Israel does not necessarily show you are a friend of Israel. "That's what Harper and [U.S. President George] Bush did."

By supporting Israel during its war with Hezbollah, the two leaders encouraged Israel's military response, even while many Israelis called for other solutions. (The war began when Hezbollah killed eight Israeli soldiers and kidnapped two others who were on patrol on the Israeli side of the border.)

Berlin, the founding editor of the Walrus magazine, said Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defence Minister Amir Peretz underestimated Hezbollah while believing their decision to bomb the group "gave them points" with their friends in the United States.

He said Olmert, like former U.S. defence secretary Donald Rumsfeld in Iraq, believed Israel "could finish off Hezbollah in a day or two."

As a result of that failed policy, the IDF is in a "tailspin" and Israelis have lost confidence in the armed forces, Berlin said.

"Who now could say supporting the war was an act of friendship?" he asked.

In a question-and-answer session, Rae was asked if a Liberal government would review the Conservative government's policy of cutting aid to Hamas. He said he would not endorse formal recognition of, or active political engagement with, a Hamas government that does not recognize Israel and "feels it's OK to attack civilians when they want to attack civilians."

However, the poverty being experienced by Palestinians must be addressed. "You can't starve people into submission," he said.

Rae also lashed out at Harper, rejecting suggestions by the prime minister that he is anti-Israel. "Who the hell is he to say that?" Rae asked, pointing to his lengthy involvement in seeking peace in the region.

He also stated that it's "preposterous" to claim the Liberal Party is anti-Israel.

Kent rejected suggestions that the Harper government encouraged Israel to go to war, saying instead "it recognized the right of Israel to defend itself." He said Canada had cut off $8 million in aid to the Palestinian government but continued to send $15 million to UN agencies that serve Palestinians.

Building a city of justice

The following is the sixth and final article in a series.

From the editor's desk

The Jewish soul is nurtured by Jerusalem as surely as flowers are by sun and water.

After it was lost to sovereign Jewish peoplehood, the memory of Jerusalem became a lighthouse of the longing spirit, guiding home through poetry, literature, folklore, song and enchanting visual imagery the wandering homeless Jew from the long march of his exile. In our unbroken love for the city, we had always imagined a heavenly Jerusalem (Yerushalayim shel malah) and an earthly Jerusalem (Yerushalayim shel matah.)

In our people's journey and return to the actual, physical, earthly Jerusalem where real human beings dwelled, it was very often the image of the ideal of the heavenly Jerusalem, where justice and lovingkindness were the city's nourishing streams, that propelled us forward.

But the earthly Jerusalem is, after all, a place of human beings. It suffers the problems and challenges of all places where human beings dwell, but more so given the unique demographic makeup of the city.

Many people in the city of Jerusalem live in poverty. It is not a pleasant truth about this precious, ancient-modern city. But it is true nevertheless.

According to the statistics compiled for 2003 by the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies, nearly a third (32.5 per cent) of all households live below the poverty line. Some 41.8 per cent of all residents (275,000 people) live below the poverty line, and some 53.3 per cent of the city's children live below the poverty line.

In this, the last article of six concerning the work of the Jerusalem Foundation, we conclude with a few words about the Community Advocacy Centre, a foundation-aided project such as that described in this space last week, depicting again the "smaller" heroism of ordinary people who together decide to build something for others even as they build for themselves.

Community advocacy came to Israel in 1993 modelled on Project Genesis, a social rights activist program designed by McGill University's Jim Torczyner more than 30 years ago. It established storefront agencies to help disadvantaged individuals acquire and develop the individual skills and confidence vital for good citizenship and the beginnings, at least, of economic self-sufficiency. There are community advocacy centres in Israel today, in Jerusalem, Be'er Sheva and Lod. The first centre was established in Be'er Sheva. The Jewish community of Montreal was instrumental in helping establish that first centre.

The centre in Jerusalem is located in the Katamon neighbourhood in the southwestern part of the city. Barbara Epstein, a feisty, articulate, impassioned former New Yorker, who made aliyah in 1975, is its executive director. Although paid professionals – lawyers and social workers – work at the centre, it could not run without its volunteers.

Epstein advised that the centre focuses on three kinds of activities: rights education, where people become familiar with their rights and entitlements; organizational work, where people are taught how to form public policy lobby groups to try to influence the outcome of the legislative process; and food co-ops, where the community uses its own economic power to run a co-operative to provide food and basic supplies to each other. To be able to buy provisions from the co-op, one has to volunteer services there. One person per family must volunteer a minimum of two hours per month. All the people who work at the co-op are volunteers except for a paid staff person who generally is in charge of seeing that the place is properly administered.

In addition to the storefront structural model that has been adopted by the advocacy centres, the influence of McGill University's Torczyner can be felt throughout the program.

Through the McGill University Middle East Program in Civil Society and Peace Building (about which CJN reporter Janice Arnold has written over the years), Israelis are receiving fellowships for post-graduate training that helps prepare them for professional roles in the advocacy centres. Indeed, during our visit to the Katamon food co-op, we met with two graduates from Torczyner's program.

Noa Rivlin, who happened to walk into the food co-op just as our group of reporters was there, studied at McGill two years ago. Kobi Halpern is actually the coordinator of the co-op. He returned to Jerusalem last October after a compressed six-month course of training and study in the McGill program.

In 2005, some 5,800 people turned to the Advocacy Centres in Jerusalem and Be'er Sheva, and 267 individuals took part in the advocacy centres' activities as volunteers and activists. The impact of the advocacy centres' work however, goes much farther than advancing the interests and rights of a needy household or of an individual's sense of self-esteem and worth.

The people who come together in the advocacy centres are teaching the skills that enable individuals to think of themselves simply as individuals with needs, and no longer as "needy;" simply as individuals without advantage over others, and not as "disadvantaged."

In the process, they are helping to build a society in which the earthly Jerusalem more closely reflects the ideal of the longed-for heavenly inspiration, where the terms justice, democracy and equality are not simply textbook chapters but meaningful prescriptions for holding bureaucracy and government to account.

Israeli MK predicts attack on Iran

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israeli Knesset member Effie Eitam has a reputation as a hawk, but on the question of Iran and its nuclear program, he believes he speaks for the country's mainstream strategic thinkers.

Diplomatic and political manoeuvres to rein in the Islamic state are feckless and doomed to fail, leaving Israel, with or without the co-operation of the United States, no alternative but to use military force to put an end to the nuclear threat, he says.

Effie Eitam

"Israel is preparing and will definitely take action," Eitam predicted. "We will not live under that shadow for our children and grandchildren. Israelis survived the Holocaust not to live under that threat again."

Eitam delivered his sobering assessment of Israel's strategic place in the Middle East prior to a public address last week at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue. He was speaking at a fundraiser in support of Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, Beit Halochem Canada, a charity that provides rehabilitation, counselling and recreational services to wounded Israeli soldiers. Eitam said the charity is dear to him, as many of his military comrades benefit from its services.

Prior to visiting Toronto, Eitam was in Washington, where he met with U.S. senators and congressmen and spoke at four think tanks about the current Mideast situation. He also spoke last week in Montreal.

Eitam told The CJN that Israel may have to act alone against Iran within "a window" to two to three years, but he suggested Israel would move before Bush leaves office.

Neither Hillary Clinton nor Barack Obama, the leading Democratic presidential candidates, have the stomach to tackle Iran militarily, Eitam said, and he wasn't sure how Republican contenders Rudy Giuliani and John McCain would act.

Eitam said a pre-emptive attack would be justified under the principle of self defence, and at any rate, Israel can't afford to wait until Iran actually possesses a nuclear device.

He said that with American co-operation – Israeli planes would have to fly over Iraq en route to Iran – the mission would be a success. Israel would enjoy total air domination, would be able to avoid anti-aircraft defences and over time destroy the nuclear facilities.

He said Israel could handle Iranian retaliation, including Hezbollah missile attacks, especially after internal Israel Defence Forces reviews of the Lebanon war and the removal of senior IDF officers.

Eitam predicted the United States would support Israel's attack – as would other democratic nations, including Canada. The alternative would mean "the genie was out of the bottle."

What if a suitcase device was smuggled into Toronto and the Canadian government was threatened with a nuclear attack if it didn't hand over $3 billion to terrorists? "Let's see what the Canadian government would do then," he said.

Faced with that sort of threat, many countries will support an Israeli strike against Iran, he said.

And if they don't? "We are dealing with a nuclear weapon in the hands of Ahmadinejad, who's already said the bomb is to deal with Israel. So who cares what the Europeans will say?"

As for the United States, Eitam said the rationale for going to war in Iraq – to stop a madman from acquiring weapons of mass destruction – applies exactly to Iran. "It would be a strategic tragedy if the United States stabilizes Iraq, but is so weakened by that operation that the credibility of the president is so low that they couldn't strike Iran."

Turning to the Palestinian front, Eitam dismissed the Mecca accord between Hamas and Fatah that created a unity government. "We should be realistic. The Mecca agreement is more false hope, another step of deception designed to save the Hamas government and end the sanctions."

Eitam, a career military man who led a commando unit during the 1976 Entebbe rescue operation, left the IDF as a brigadier general in 2000 to join the National Religious Party. He split with that party over its support for the Gaza pullout and co-founding the Renewed Religious National Zionist Party.

He attracted controversy late last year when he called for the removal of most West Bank Palestinians and when he called Israeli Arabs a fifth column and traitors.

Eitam said Hamas had not given up any of its core principles, including its goal of destroying Israel.

"It's not about territory. It's not about recognition. They're not interested in any state, and no land will satisfy them. They're totally recruited by the Islamic revolution and are the spearhead of the Islamic revolution."

Furthermore, Palestinian culture has deteriorated to such an extent that it is considered legitimate to indoctrinate suicide bombers from the age of six.

"It will take a long time – decades, maybe centuries – to bring Arabic and Islamic culture back to normalcy," he said.

In the meantime, Israel must remain behind its security barrier, which has produced relative quiet. He predicted that over time, Palestinians' daily lives would improve as they get an independent road system, roadblocks would disappear and commerce improve.

"It's not paradise, but it's a containment situation that in the end will bring more life, hope and respect between the two parties," he said.

Theatre group offers Orthodox girls chance to perform

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Rivka Lomiansky hopes that creating a theatre troupe for Orthodox girls will give them an opportunity to express themselves through the arts.

Lomiansky is the program creator and artistic director of Neshama Theatre Troupe, an all-girls theatre summer program that "addresses the importance of art and expression by providing a modest environment where girls can explore and develop their talents."

Lomiansky, a 23-year-old ba'al tshuvah, said that this is the first summer program of its kind in Toronto for Torah-observant girls aged seven to 13.

"We teach them through professional instruction, drama, vocal lessons and dance. At the end of the six-week program, we put on a production in theatre," she said, adding that the theatre troupe will launch this summer.

The plays will "exhibit good morals and inspiring events, as well as express important values of Jewish women and Torah lifestyle. It is our goal, that in a safe and Jewish atmosphere, our girls be allowed the rewarding experience of expressing their neshamas through the arts," it said on the website.

"The reason I opened this is because there are certain restrictions on Torah-observant girls. For example, they can't sing in front of men or dance in front of men, and there are certain levels of modesty that have to be observed with what you wear, how you dance, what you sing and what you perform. I wanted to create an environment that is comfortable for that specific target market, because there is nothing available to them."

Before Lomiansky became Orthodox, she was considered a triple threat in the entertainment industry.

She appeared in her first feature film in 1992, playing one of three sisters in Bruce McDonald's film titled Highway 61. She had a leading role in a children's television show called System Crash, was a singer in a pop music group, and appeared in many commercials. She studied at the American Academy of Dramatic Arts in New York.

Participants will be learning drama, singing and dance skills with the instruction of experienced Jewish professionals, including Janice Wilson, an experienced musical instructor, and Helen Winkler, a Yiddish/Israeli folk dance instructor.

The six-week program, which runs from July 2 to Aug. 13, also includes davening each morning and a positive body-image workshop.

Rivka Lomiansky

Lomiansky said that the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre partnered with the theatre troupe to offer workshops on healthy body image.

"There have been studies that eating disorders are very high in this target market. Miles Nadal has a grant to provide classes for these girls," Lomiansky said.

"There will also be cooking classes, yoga classes, swimming, and a lot of extra workshops. The yoga is going to be a movement class with lectures and the cooking class will be about nutrition and about how to eat right."

Yoga and expressive art and dance therapy sessions will be led by Kinneret Dubowitz, and the healthy cooking and nutrition courses will be led by Denise Myerowitz.

Lomiansky hopes that further down the road, she'll be able to start an after-school program for more specific age groups once a week.

With extreme caution

The Secretary General of the Arab League, Amr Moussa, announced last week that the 22-member league will convene at the end of this month in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. At the initiative of the Saudi hosts, the central item on the agenda will be the proposal first floated by Saudi Arabia in 2002 to embark on pan-Arab peace negotiations with Israel. The basis of the negotiations, essentially, would be full recognition of the Jewish state by the members of the Arab League for full Israeli withdrawal from the territories won in its wars with Arab states.

The precise language of the peace proposal on offer by the league is not yet clear. The original, 2002 initiative by the Saudis was considerably toughened in subsequent meetings by the league to specifically require Israel to return all lands captured in the Six Day War and to accept the right of Palestinian "refugees" to return to their former homes.

Israel has expressed its disappointment with the hardline position of the league. It cannot live with a Palestinian right of return and yet still hope to remain a Jewish state.

But Moussa, attempting to ensure that none of the highly manipulable and highly inflammable "streets" of the Arab capitals erupt in hot rage and protest merely at the possibility of negotiations with the Jewish state, has announced that "the Arab peace initiative expresses an Arab consensus and will not be redrafted as demanded by some foreign powers" – meaning Israel.

Israel will surely await the outcome of the Riyadh meeting later this month and scrutinize the nuanced details of the meeting's final communiqué before making definitive statements regarding its response to the league's proposal. There is more at play here than meets the eye.

The Saudis have orchestrated the meeting and the agenda at this time to send a clear signal to the regime in Iran. The Saudi kingdom – the Sunni protector of Islam's holiest places – is also very concerned about Iranian (i.e., Shia) intentions in the region.

Setting aside the trustworthiness and reliability of the Arab League's promise to confer full diplomatic recognition on Israel, there is no denying that the Saudis have an abiding economic interest in ensuring the political stability of the Middle East. Indeed, the mere promise by the league (read: Saudi Arabia) of the possibility of a peace agreement with the Jewish state suggests a strategic policy that is diametrically at odds with the oft-stated Iranian strategy of seeing the Jewish state "wiped off the face of the map."

In effect, the Saudi rulers are speaking to Iran's leaders as much as they are speaking to Israel's leaders. The Israelis understand this. Therefore, the Israelis will likely grasp at every straw fluttering in the Riyadh wind to see if there is a chance to carry peace discussions forward. But they will do so with extreme caution. For despite Israel's willingness to be flexible and to compromise, there is a limit to flexibility and a line past which there can be no compromise.

Israeli soldiers evacuated nearly 200 illegal squatters in the Sinai who were protesting the return of the peninsula to Egypt. In one settlement, Yamit, young people from Rabbi Meir Kahane's Kach movement barricaded themselves inside a building and surrounded it with burning tires. Unarmed soldiers had to hack through with axes to remove them.

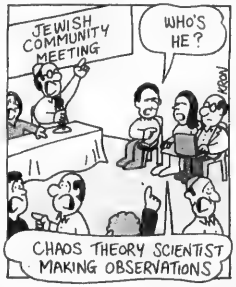
Reference to Heschel school criticized

I am completely outraged and disgusted with the poor editorial judgment shown in the article "Do Jewish day schools make the grade?" (Live and Learn, CJN, March 1). I cannot believe that you decided to publish this article, which is extremely critical of Jewish day schools, in the very same supplement in which you solicited Jewish day schools to advertise. I hope every single school demands their money back.

In particular, I am extremely upset about your decision to include an interview with an unhappy ex-Toronto Heschel School parent. The quotes from this parent were extremely offensive and one-sided. This portrayal of the Toronto Heschel School is unacceptable. You also included a quote from an Associated Hebrew Schools parent, but it was not nearly as damaging. You also gave a happy Associated parent an opportunity to praise their school, which you did not do with Heschel.



As you are probably aware, you could have easily found unhappy parents who have made decisions to leave every single day school. No school is perfect and no school is perfect for every child or every family. However, there are always two sides to these stories, and more often than not, dissatisfaction with a school has to do with the lack of educational fit with a particular student. Also, many parents find it difficult to accept the a problem might be two-way, and not just the school's fault. If you felt so strongly that you had to put this article in this supplement, you should have never named any of the day schools. To single out any school is unbalanced and unprofessional reporting. The Toronto Heschel School is the only school cast in an exclusively negative light.

For the record, I am an extremely satisfied parent with three children at the Toronto Heschel School. In fact, my husband and I agree that it is the only school we would ever choose for our children in this city.

You owe the Toronto Heschel School a public apology and some positive air time. I feel that the damage you have done to the Toronto Heschel School in this article far outweighs any benefit the school may have derived from our expensive ad.

Security not addressed by Jewish leaders

It would seem perfectly clear that what Natan Sharansky is trying to tell world Jewry ("Mobilize now, save the world," CJN, Feb. 22) is that there could be a second Shoah in the making, considering how "well" Jewish leadership, including such organizations as Canadian Jewish Congress, do where security – or should that be survival? – is concerned.

Our Jewish leadership here in Canada is terrific at distributing "playgrounds" to the Jewish community, such as hospitals, old age institutions, convalescent retreats, libraries, schools and on and on. However, on the security and safety of our Jewish community, there is on record hardly one public meeting, debate, literature, demonstration or march pertinent to our surviving those evils that threaten us. Jewry labours under a sense of extremely dangerous false security.

Income testing for school tax credit

Ontario Progressive Conservative leader John Tory deserves great credit for his commitment to address Ontario's current official discrimination by providing some form of funding to non-Catholic faith-based schools. Whether the funding is delivered by bringing the affected schools directly into the sphere of publicly funded education, or whether it's by way of a tax credit to parents, it can be extended with accountability and educational requirements that will ensure that it benefits all Ontarians.

The suggestion for income-testing, though, makes little sense, unless parents of Catholic school students will also be income-tested. If Tory wants the public to understand that his funding initiative addresses discrimination and unfairness, and to support it on that basis, then it should be designed in a way that provides genuine equality.

Searching for the Applebaum family

While going through a pile of 60-year-old documents, I discovered that my great-grandfather had a sister. No one in my family has ever heard of her, but she is listed on her brother's 1946 French immigration form: Mrs. Schaia Applebaum (née Niderman) was born in Siedliszcze, Poland, around the turn of the century and immigrated to Montreal shortly before or after World War II.

If you have any information about the Applebaum family, please contact Leah Aharoni at leah25@017.net.il.

Organized Canadian Jewry: past and present

By HAROLD M. WALLER

(Part one)

Canada's Jewish community, one of the largest and best organized in the Diaspora, has evolved considerably since the first efforts to establish comprehensive community structures nearly a century ago. Since the early days of organizing local communities and then moving to the countrywide level, numerous changes have taken place in response to both internal and external developments. As a result, the organizational structure of the community looks a lot different today than it did 40 or 50 years ago.

One of the major factors that have affected the way community business is conducted is the need to marshal resources on behalf of Israel. Indeed, as matters involving Israel have become a central focus of the Canadian Jewish agenda, the need for bodies that are responsive on the Israel issue has become paramount in community planning.

Taking the long view, among the most notable changes are the rise to pre-eminence of local federations and related bodies, the emergence of federation-backed national agencies, the diminished status of Canadian Jewish Congress, and the visible emphasis on Israel-oriented organizations and activities. Major changes were made just a few years ago. So it is appropriate now to take stock of what has happened over the years and why, to examine the key organizations that operate currently and to assess how effectively the new structure contributes to the achievement of community goals.

At the outset, it's important to bear in mind that the Canadian Jewish community is a voluntary political system. No one is compelled to belong, but most Jews choose to affiliate in one way or another, usually by joining a Jewish organization of some sort or by donating annually to a local federation campaign or directly to a local or national Jewish organization.

Even though the system that is created by these actions is not democratic according to the standards that we expect in the politics of a country, support of community bodies can be interpreted as a sign of consent and continued financial commitments as indicators of a measure of allegiance. Certainly, the community bodies are regarded as legitimate by most Canadian Jews. Of course there are some who choose not to be affiliated and who may even complain loudly and publicly when an organization claims to speak on behalf of the community as a whole. In a technical sense, they may have a point, but in practical terms, national bodies are entitled to speak on behalf of the organized Jewish community.

The ability to represent authoritatively Canada's Jews is vital because of the need to promote various Jewish causes in federal, provincial and local politics. Insofar as there are Jewish community interests, and there certainly are, Jewish legislators at all three levels can do part of the job of representing those interests, but their tasks are more complex and certainly extend beyond the narrow concerns of Jews. Moreover, they are often constrained by the realities of party discipline. Consequently, the community has to represent itself directly to parties, to governments, to the public, to the media, and even overseas. In the current environment, this has become a critical task for community leaders. The demands of contemporary politics necessitate a much different kind of community structure than community leaders early in the last century could have imagined.

In the early days of the Canadian Jewish community, the main focus of institutional development reflected the needs of the time. In addition to synagogues, members of the community established a variety of educational, social, and health and welfare organizations. These were geared to the needs of a largely immigrant community, most of whose members often needed assistance to deal with the exigencies of everyday life. Eventually, during the second decade of the 20th century, both the Toronto and Montreal communities recognized the need for more co-operation and co-ordination of the services that they delivered. The solution was to bring the various delivery agencies together into co-operative structures. These eventually became the mainstays of organized community life in those two large centres. Smaller communities generally opted for a community council structure.

One of the features that distinguished these co-operative structures was the emphasis on centralized fundraising and allocations, based on a community-wide campaign. Over the years, it became clear that this was an extremely effective way to raise the money that the communities needed to support a wide range of activities. Some groups remained independent of the centralized structure and did their own fundraising. However, the clear trend during the last century was toward bringing as many groups as possible into the structure. This gave them a reliable and generally predictable revenue stream, but it clearly compromised their independence, because the centralized structure controlled the allocations and therefore the budgets of the constituent agencies. The experience of the American Jewish community, which was heavily oriented toward a federation model, eventually had a major impact on Canadian Jewish life, especially as the Canadian centralized structures became involved actively with the U.S. federation movement and eventually adopted the federation structure as well.

One of the features of Canadian Jewish life that distinguished it from the American version was Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC). Although there were countrywide community bodies in the United States, none had the impact that Congress did in Canada. There were at least two things that made CJC different from the federations and that enabled it to have considerable influence on the development of the community.

The first was its overt political purpose. Congress was designed to be a representative body of Canadian Jewry, one that would interact with governments at all levels in order to convey the concerns of its constituents and to press governments to respond to those concerns. Of course, CJC performed other functions as well (e.g., community relations, promoting Jewish culture, and representing Canada in the forums of world Jewry, Holocaust remembrance and the pursuit of Nazi war criminals), but its primary vocation was to serve as the political voice of organized Jewry to governments and individual Canadians.

CJC's second distinguishing characteristic was the democratic process that was an integral part of its activities. In principle, every Jewish organization in the country was represented in Congress. Every three years, a national convention, the Plenary, was held. The various organizations sent delegates to what was often a very raucous meeting, one in which contested elections for officers and spirited battles over resolutions were common.

Despite its prominence and its pre-eminent position among Canadian Jews, Congress had a serious weakness: the lack of a dependable funding base. While the late Samuel Bronfman was alive and supporting the organization that he headed for so many years, funding was not a serious problem. But after his death in 1971, CJC had to look farther afield in order to find the resources to sustain itself.

That period of need coincided with other developments that had an impact on Congress. After the 1967 Six Day War, Israel became a central – and perhaps the most important – concern of Canadian Jewry. The realization and recognition of the danger that Israel had faced in the period leading up to that war led Canadian Jews to focus on Israel's well-being to an unprecedented extent. CJC certainly was in the forefront of those bodies actively supporting Israel, but in the judgment of community leadership, it was not able to do the job entirely on its own. As a result, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) was founded. CJC was one of the key partners that ran CIC, but it shared responsibility with other national bodies. Thus in matters involving Israel, CJC, while prominent, was not pre-eminent.

The other development was the growth of the federation movement. The federations, which ran the annual community fundraising campaigns such as the United Jewish Appeal in Toronto and the Combined Jewish Appeal in Montreal, became the most reliable source of financial resources in the countrywide community, and they gradually expanded from primarily local operations to gain a genuinely national presence. Since the federations raised the money, they also controlled the way in which it was spent, which meant that both local and country-wide bodies had to come to the federations for funding.

The local federations set aside a certain amount of money for country-wide activities and established mechanisms for allocating those funds. Ultimately, CJC had to come to the federations to join in the allocation process at the national level. In so doing, it obtained a steady and reliable source of income, but it ceded a considerable amount of autonomy, because the federations were not in the habit of writing blank cheques. If they were going to provide the funds, they wanted a significant role in determining how the money would be spent. Thus Congress, which once had styled itself as "the Parliament of Canadian Jewry," could no longer claim to be the most important voice of the community.

The process described above diminished the role of Congress with respect to matters involving Israel, not only because of the activities of the CIC but also because the federations had started to become the community's link to Israel through a number of programs and priority in bringing prominent Israelis to Canada for speaking engagements. However, CJC also faced competition on the domestic scene as B'nai Brith Canada became more assertive about defining an independent role in community relations, combating anti-Semitism, and relating to governments. The result of all these processes was a revised perception of CJC's clout, both within the community and in the environment external to the community.

Anti-Zionism at Mac

Israeli Apartheid Week has become a mid-winter staple at many universities across Canada, the United States and England. But inasmuch as this loathsome event attracts attention whenever it takes place, it is certainly not the only manifestation of anti-Zionism that many Jewish students have to deal with during their school year.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Take the experience at McMaster University in Hamilton, for example. Just a few weeks into the first semester, a panel discussion on campus focused on the Middle East – a re-appraisal, in part, of the summer hostilities in southern Lebanon. Of the invited speakers, not one was pro-Israel. There was absolutely no attempt at balance in any of the speakers' presentations, and not even a mention of Israeli suffering or Israeli casualties during the confrontation that had just recently ended.

Shortly after that "discourse," a well-meaning medical student tried to identify experts who would debate the effects of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict on the health of non-combatants in the region.

At the insistence of the Jewish Students' Association (JSA), the student agreed that one of his three presenters would be selected to provide the Israeli perspective.

But further planning of the program was abruptly stopped after a Google search of the person suggested by the JSA led the student to conclude that he was about to give a platform to a "Zionist" – clearly something that neither he nor his mentors were willing to chance. That he, or they, actually understood what a "Zionist" is remains uncertain.

Then, in early January, as featured speaker for the annual Bertrand Russell Peace Lectures, Francis Boyle came to McMaster. A professor of international law at the University of Illinois, Boyle was legal advisor to the PLO from 1991 to 1993. He is an outspoken proponent of divestment campaigns against Israel, has written widely about "Israel's crimes against Palestinians," and has urged that "Palestine should sue Israel for genocide."

That a so-called peace lecture should take the form of an Israel-bashing exercise – which it inevitably did – seemed not at all to faze either the organizers or the audience.

With such precedents as a warning, the appearance of DePaul University professor Norman Finkelstein on campus – as the keynote speaker during Israeli Apartheid Week – should have come as no great surprise. Peddling his usual melange of Holocaust revisionism and visceral anti-Zionism, he was generously applauded by those who sat through his disgraceful rant.

Taken together, these separate, but similarly toxic, events have undoubtedly created an unpleasant – and even an intimidating – environment for Jewish students at McMaster.

How the students have reacted – and the attitude of the faculty and of the Hamilton community at large toward all of this – will be the subject of my column next month.

Forgotten virtues of leadership

Waves of nostalgia seemed to sweep over Israel for former prime minister Menachem Begin and his leadership on the 15th anniversary of his death recently.

Like any political leader, of course, he had his fanatic followers and his bitter opponents. And during his long career, he was greatly admired by many, but also much maligned. But memories of his leadership cast a giant shadow over the country's political leaders of recent years. It's not only his followers who wish that somebody like him were at the helm in these trying times.

Moshe Arens in Jerusalem

What was it about Begin's leadership? In addition to his great intellectual and rhetorical skills, he was guided throughout his adult life by a sense of mission. Whether as commander of the Irgun Tzvai Leumi in the fight against British rule in Palestine or as leader of the opposition during his many years in the Knesset or during the seven years he served as prime minister, Begin was always imbued with the feeling that he was serving the Jewish people and the State of Israel, and that a giant responsibility rested on his shoulders.

Upon stepping into the prime minister's office on June 20, 1977, Begin felt that the fate of the Jewish people lay in his hands. The picture of the little Jewish boy with the raised hands passing before a German soldier in the Warsaw Ghetto was on his desk throughout his years in the position. And when on Aug. 28, 1984, Begin told his colleagues at the cabinet table of his intention to resign and responded to their insistent protests by telling them that he could not go on anymore, it was clear that at that moment, he felt the responsibility had become more than he could carry. Therein lies the answer to the frequently asked question of why Begin resigned: he did so when he felt that he could no longer bear the burden of responsibility.

The view that leadership was a responsibility entrusted to them by the electorate was common to all of Israel's first generation of leaders, from David Ben-Gurion to Yitzhak Shamir. It was true of Yitzhak Rabin, who on the eve of the Six Day War felt momentarily that the responsibility of being the head of Israel's armed forces was too much for him.

In recent years, Israel's leaders, both those who have aspired to the position of prime minister and those who have attained it, have shouldered the burden much more lightly. Many seem to see the position as just another station in their career. This view, no doubt, impairs their ability to adequately perform the task. Important decisions are made too lightly, important appointments are made too casually, and, of course, no mistakes are ever acknowledged.

Begin had a statesmanlike view of the civil service. He believed in appointing people on the basis of merit. He continued to work with people appointed during the Labor Party's tenure in office, such as Simcha Dinitz, Israel's ambassador to Washington, if he considered them to be capable. He did not believe that membership in the Likud's central committee entitled a person to a job in government. The handing out of jobs to members of Likud's central committee, and worse yet, to those faithful to particular camps in the Likud, was totally foreign to Begin's conception of a government worthy of the people of Israel. He would have never stood for it, nor would Shamir, his successor.

The deterioration in the Israeli political scene is in no small measure the result of this kind of patronage and influence-peddling, which began after Shamir left the prime minister's office.

At first it was restricted to the lower levels of government service, but then it continued right up to the top positions. The limit was reached when, for the first time in Israel's history, an IDF chief of staff was booted out so that one who seemed more amenable could be appointed.

Begin was a modest man– modest in his demeanour and in his style of living, as were his predecessors and his immediate successor. That, too, seems to have become a forgotten virtue in Israel in more recent times.

Moshe Arens is a former Israeli minister of defence in the government of Menachem Begin.

Reining in CIDA's radicals

While Canadian foreign policy has moved away from simplistic slogans and political correctness, some officials have not gotten the word. In particularly, the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) continues to run its own foreign policy, which is at odds with the goals and objectives proclaimed by Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

CIDA's annual budget of more than $3 billion makes this agency a very powerful force. When these resources are used to promote extremism, under the guise of "international development" and "peace building," this is a serious problem.

In one of the more disturbing examples, CIDA supported the publication of a recent book titled Palestinian Refugee Repatriation: Global Perspectives. The book's premise repeats the Palestinian claim to a "right of return." Such claims are removed from the context of the numerous wars and terror attacks – particularly the violent rejection of the 1947 United Nations partition plan and the Arab invasion. In that war, one per cent of the Jewish population was killed, and the clock can't be turned back to return them to life.

For almost 60 years, Arab states, abetted by the United Nations, have kept Palestinian refugees and their families in camps in order to use them as part of the continuing war. By seeking to flood Israel with Palestinians, their goal is to use demographics to end Jewish sovereignty. Palestinian refugee claims and former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's denial of Jewish rights in Jerusalem were the two main reasons for the failure of the Oslo negotiations.

Given this background, the government of Canada's support for a one-sided book promoting the Palestinian position, and excluding experts such as Prof. Ruth Lapidot who argue the opposite position, is counterproductive. (The grant for this book was provided by the Middle East Expert and Advisory Services Fund, which is managed by CIDA and the International Development Research Centre, another Canadian government body, in cooperation with the Department of Foreign Affairs and International trade, as well as by its British equivalent, which is well-known for being pro-Palestinian.)

Erasing terrorism and using loaded terms such as "ethnic cleansing," it's not surprising that the book is recommended by the "Palestinian Pundit" blog site. Support for this publication also undermines Canada's claims to be "an honest broker" in dealing with the complex politics of refugee claims.

This is only one example of CIDA's support for radical campaigns. A study by the Canadian Coalition for Democracies (CCD) highlights the lack of accountability in CIDA's programs and the absence of independent impact studies.

According to the CCD, "Not only is CIDA acting irresponsibly with regard to its programs, it is demonstrating a flagrant lack of respect for Canadian taxpayers and an indifference to the plight of the needy… contrary to the spirit and intention of government policy." As the CCD notes, Canadians contributed $425 million in emergency assistance following the Asian tsunami in 2004. "To date Canadians cannot be provided with a clean audit of where and how these funds were distributed, and what measure of success followed as a result."

Like their counterparts in Britain's aid agency (DFID) and others throughout Europe, CIDA officials tend to patronizingly reinforce Palestinian victimization and subsidize radical anti-Israel politics. NGO Monitor reports show how CIDA "development" funds are channelled to Medical Aid for Palestinians, Médecins du Monde, the Mennonite Central Committee, Oxfam, World Vision, and others that campaign against Israel.

While CIDA claims to fund specific projects and not organizations, money for salaries and infrastructure supports all of the activities of a recipient nongovernmental organization. Alternatives, a Montreal based NGO that is supported by CIDA, promotes Palestinian positions and rhetoric inside Canada, which is clearly a violation of procedures for government-supported groups.

The CCD report also notes that CIDA has provided hundreds of millions of dollars in aid to the Palestinian Authority – with "little to show in terms of gains for freedom and democracy" – including massive support for UNRWA (the UN Relief and Works Agency), whose involvement in "incitement and violence [is] well-documented."

For these and other reasons, Canada's elected officials must finally take control of CIDA's funding, particularly when it comes to radical political groups and causes.

An excellent overview of Jewish history

Howard Sachar's magnum opus, A History of the Jews in the Modern World (Random House), is like old wine in a new bottle. I offer this observation not as a backhanded compliment but as praise. Portions of this book were originally published in 1958 in The Course of Modern Jewish History and then recycled in a revised edition in 1990. The latest edition, 831 pages in length, is fresh and vital, like an excellent new vintage.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Brimming with insights that only a seasoned, erudite scholar like Sachar could muster, A History of the Jews in the Modern World ranges far and wide, covering a span of 400 years and encapsulating the triumphs and tragedies of a people whose contributions to civilization are legion.

Whether he is writing about the role of Jews in 19th century Germany, the establishment of the first ghetto in Rome, the attitude of Catherine II toward Russian Jews, the Jewish community in colonial America, the status of Jews in Arab societies or the rise of Zionism, Sachar brings an authoritative tone to his narrative and a sure, steady hand to his prose. This is history at its best, buttressed by facts, burnished by knowledge and backed by a seamlessly flowing style.

He begins in 17th century Central Europe, where Jews were, at best, tolerated. Subjected to capricious edicts and barred from access to the feudal land system, Jews never knew what tomorrow would bring.

Often limited to the precarious occupations of retail peddling, hawking and moneylending, Jews lived on the edge.

The ghetto, a creation of Pope Paul IV, was demeaning in the extreme. Yet, within the ghetto walls, Jews were free to manage their own affairs, run their own schools, hospitals and public baths and regulate their own trade and markets.

Jews in Poland could preserve and develop their religious and cultural traditions more freely than Jews in German-speaking lands, and were valued by feudal magnates as estate and business managers and rent and tax collectors. But the economic role Jews played in eastern Europe would come to haunt them.

Proclaiming freedom of religion for all its inhabitants, Holland was probably the first European country to give Jews the right to live where they chose, to practise their own rites and ceremonies and to engage in livelihoods without interference. By the end of the 17th century, the security they enjoyed was unsurpassed on the continent.

Sachar goes on to chronicle the readmission of Jews to Britain, the emergence of Hofjuden, or court Jews, in the Habsburg Empire, the emancipation of Jews in France in the wake of the 1789 revolution and the role of Napoleon in improving the condition of Jews in various parts of Europe.

Catherine II, a former Protestant princess, ascended the Russian throne as something of a liberal, but succumbing to the influence of the Orthodox church, she ostracized Jews and limited their presence to the Pale of Settlement, in the northwest and southwest of Russia. This was followed by a dark period during which young Jewish army recruits were forcibly baptized at a rate of between 1,000 to 2,000 a year. Russian Jews saw an improvement in their situation in the last third of the 19th century, when they represented 15 per cent of the student body in universities.

But for every step forward, Jews were forced two steps backward, such as when pogroms ravished the community in the 1880s. Sachar claims that new archival research suggests that the czar did not, as previously assumed, encourage the violence.

Turning to the Italian peninsula, Sachar charts the connection between Giuseppe Mazzini's Young Italy movement and the full emancipation of Jews. "Nowhere in Europe was the alliance between Jews and liberals more tightly knit than in Italy, or ultimately more productive," he notes.

As might be expected, Sachar devotes chapter and verse to the place of Jews in what is now Germany.

In a prelude to his discussion of Nazi Germany, Sachar takes us through the tumult and majesty of the Weimar Republic, where Jews achieved heretofore unprecedented prominence in the arts and sciences. German Jews were so attached to the fatherland that many remained in Germany, even after the rise of Adolf Hitler. By 1941, 263,000 Jews, or about half of the pre-war Jewish population, still lived in Germany.

The Holocaust, a topic he covers extensively, altered Jewish demographics in Europe. Fifty seven per cent of the world's Jews were found there before World War II, compared to 32 per cent today.

Sachar's analysis of the Jewish presence in Palestine is interesting. One thousand years ago, Palestine was home to 250,000 Jews. The Crusaders largely wiped out the community, but after the Inquisition,15,000 Spanish Jews made their way to Palestine. Not more than about 6,000 Jews were left in Palestine by the early 19th century, concentrated in Tiberias, Safed, Hebron and Jerusalem.

Having documented these developments, Sachar discusses the rise of political Zionism, the emergence of Israel and the position of Jews in the Middle East, notably those in Turkey, Iran, Syria, Yemen and Egypt.

New immigrants leave Ellis Island in Manhattan, escorted by families and friends, 1915.

He writes with vigour about colonial America, whose Jewish inhabitants he describes as "the freest on earth." Yet they paid a price for their liberty. The original Sephardi Jewish settlers vanished as Jews, having been thoroughly assimilated.

But assimilation coexisted uneasily with anti-Semitism. During the Civil War, the U.S. Congress turned down all requests to appoint Jewish chaplains to the Union army, and in 1863, Gen. Ulysses Grant, a future president, issued an infamous order expelling Jews from three states.

In the 20th century, quotas drastically cut Jewish immigration to the bone, a numerus clausus sharply curtailed the admission of Jews to Ivy League universities, and rank discrimination in the job market stymied Jewish upward mobility. Nevertheless, Jews prospered in the United States.

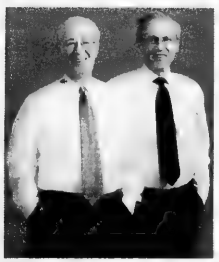
He devotes only five pages to Canada, describing it as an accidental destination for Jews fleeing oppression in Europe. But he usually manages to hit the right notes by citing some of the early pioneers, the Bronfmans, the Reichmann brothers, Quebec's relationship with its Jewish citizens, the Montreal-Toronto rivalry, the arrival of newcomers after 1945 and the perennial question of anti-Semitism. His extremely brief coverage of Canada's restrictive immigration laws in the 1930s and 1940s, however, is wholly inadequate.

Sachar's treatment of Latin America and the Caribbean, though curt, is fascinating.

In stellar fashion, Sachar traces the role of Jews in the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution and delineates their ultimate disillusionment with communism in countries ranging from the Soviet Union to Czechoslovakia.

Given the width and breadth of his subject, Sachar acquits himself admirably in A History of the Jews in the Modern World. He has mastered complex material, presented it in fetching fashion and given readers a wonderful overview.

Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund climbs over $300,000,000



Sheldon Esbin and Arthur Resnick manage the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund

Canadian investors can choose from an array of hundreds of investment types: from volatile stocks to low interest GICs. Yet more and more investors are turning to the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund. In the past year alone, investor contributions have added more than $100,000,000 to the Fund.

The Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund is an income fund that pays interest monthly. Over 95% of the Fund is invested in commercial first mortgages, all secured by the respective properties. Contributions are RRSP and RRIF eligible.

While the Fund has grown tremendously, our strategy continues to be conservative, and our performance continues to provide investors with annual distributions in the 10% range.

Female mohel performs circumcision in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Back in 1997 when she began performing ritual circumcisions, Rochelle Schwartz became only the second woman in Canada to break into the male-dominated practice.

Recently, she laid claim to another pioneering initiative, and although the Guinness people may not be all that interested, Schwartz can say that she's likely the first woman in modern times to perform a brit milah (ritual circumcision) in the State of Israel.

"It was the highlight of my career to have the honour and the privilege of doing a brit milah as a woman in Israel," she said.

Adding to the satisfaction for the Toronto-area doctor was the fact that the child was her cousin's baby and that her elderly aunt, the baby's grandmother, was present.

"It was beautiful, emotional," Schwartz said.

Schwartz has returned from Israel, basking in the glow of the very special life-cycle event. Not only did she perform the brit (also known as a bris) before family and friends, she impressed her Israeli relatives with the inclusive ceremony that she has developed over the years.

Her aunt, Radina, "led the blessing with me. It was so nice."

Schwartz's service goes beyond what might be expected at a standard brit. She refers to passages in the biblical book of Genesis on the topic, explaining in some detail the reasons behind the the ritual and referring as well to key midrashes (commentaries).

Her service is egalitarian and participatory, she said. "I incorporate women into the ceremony."

For many Israelis, it was an educational experience, she added.

Dorothy Greenbaum, president of the National Organization of American Mohalim, said, "we are so incredibly proud of Rochelle for her breakthrough work in Israel, being what we believe was the first woman mohel to perform a bris in Israel.

"This is a country that sadly needs a Reform progressive voice and I know the baby, the family and the tradition were in extremely good hands with Rochelle."

Greenbaum, a physician, added, "Hopefully it's a first step towards training Reform mohalim in Israel so that progressive Jews there will have an option" that "is sensitive to modern families and [offers] the best of medical techniques."

Rochelle Schwartz

Canadians have become accustomed to Schwartz's service. She performs an average of three brits per week for Reform and Conservative Jews, and at her circumcision clinic, she does another eight every second Friday for non-Jews, many of them Muslims.

Prior to departing for Israel, Schwartz contacted the representative of Israel's ministry of health in Jerusalem who has jurisdiction over mohalim. She learned there were no impediments to her performing the ritual in Israel – mohalim are unregulated and pretty well anyone can claim to be one.

Based on her research, Schwartz believes no other woman in modern Israel has performed a ritual circumcision. Of course, there was Tzipporah, but that was in biblical times and it was Moses' son who was circumcised.

Her Israeli relatives were quite pleased to have participated in something of a historic event.

"The family was so excited and so thrilled. They thought it was so unique to have a woman fly in all the way from Canada to do the bris," she said.

Chabad on the Avenue one of four new Toronto centres

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Menachem Gansburg and his wife Chana have brought Chabad to a trendy section of Avenue Road north of Lawrence Avenue, causing some initially confused reactions from people who wonder why they're not on nearby Bathurst Street, with its many Jewish shops and institutions.

Thirty years ago, large North American cities like Toronto typically had one Chabad institution. Today, "almost every zip code has representation," said Rabbi Zalman Grossbaum, director of Chabad Lubavitch activities for Ontario.

"You have Chabad spilling into every community, every pocket where Jews are situated."

In Toronto and the surrounding area, there are about 17 Chabad centres, including in Mississauga, Hamilton and Niagara Falls.

Typically, Chabad shluchim (emissaries) are young married couples who start their endeavour from scratch, creating programs and raising funds to become self-sustaining. "It's challenging, because these rabbis come without being invited," said Rabbi Grossbaum. "We create the demand."

In Toronto, Chabad on the Avenue – as Rabbi Gansburg's fledgling centre is known – is one of just four new Chabad centres that have opened in recent months, and plans are in the works to open one in the Beach area as well.

• Chabad Lubavitch of Downtown Toronto (jewishdt.com), run by Rabbi Mendel Gluska and his wife Chana, out of their Queen's Quay condo, serves the area south of College Street, between Bathurst and Yonge Street. They serve area residents, tourists, people who work downtown, and downtown hospital patients.

• Rabbi Moshe and Yehudis Steiner at Uptown Chabad Lubavitch (uptownchabad.com), cater to, for the most part, young families, many of whom are unaffiliated, who live in Bathurst Manor. The Steiners operate out of their home, but recently began holding Shabbat morning services at C.H. Best Middle School.

• York University also has a new Chabad, a student club run by former York student Vidal Bekerman, a 30-year-old ba'al tshuvah, and his wife Chanah Leah Medina. Bekerman, who is not a rabbi, said that there are about 300 students on his mailing list. He said he is on good terms with Hillel staff, who offer a variety of programs and services to York's 4,500 Jewish students. However, noted Bekerman, there is still a large percentage "that needs to be reached."

The Gansburgs have been on Avenue Road in a 6,000-square-foot former restaurant, across from the upscale food store Pusateri's, since December. They are reaching out to Jews in the area bounded by Wilson Avenue and Eglinton Avenue, Yonge Street and the Allen Road.

On an initial visit to the area west of Avenue Road and north of Lawrence, where many small postwar homes have been replaced by newer, larger ones, the Gansburgs noted that a large percentage of the homes had mezuzot.

They introduced themselves to about 50 neighbours by going door-to-door with challah for Shabbat. Many residents told the Gansburgs they didn't even know their neighbours.

Rabbi wants to 'create a tight-knit community'

The rabbi, a 25-year-old Toronto native who grew up in Thornhill, said he wants to "create a tight-knit community." Typically, he said, residents of the area are young families with parents who are "very successful, but very overworked.

"We are here to service the local Jewish community in anything they need." Programs include a "Kiddie Care" afternoon drop-in centre that features weekly challah-baking, evening Torah classes, a women's program and the Avenue Road Synagogue, which attracts more than 40 people to Shabbat morning services – and almost double that when services are followed by a kiddush.

Most of the "members" (there is no membership fee) belong to other synagogues, the rabbi noted, referring to existing institutions that service area residents.

Although Chabad's highest priority is outreach to unaffiliated Jews,"if someone happens to be a member [elsewhere] and wants to come to our synagogue," they are welcome, he said. The shul, where men and women sit on either side of a row of artificial trees, offers Friday night and Saturday morning services.

Although Chabad is Orthodox, it's "non-threatening," said Rabbi Gansburg. There's "no obligation" to become religious, but he is happy to help anyone who wants to "advance" in their Judaism.

Joy Kaufman, a 47-year-old mother of two who is affiliated with a synagogue that is not close to her home, describes the Avenue Road facility as "a great place to be.

"You've got to come on a Saturday. It's magical," she said, adding that she is "not the least bit religious." She was at the centre to help organize last weekend's Purim program that was scheduled to feature a smoothie bar from Pusateri's and costume judges from Canadian Idol.

Chana, a 21-year-old teacher who grew up in Montreal, runs the children's program and the "Jewish Women's Circle," which offers programs every six to eight weeks. For Tu b'Shvat, a local chef demonstrated fruit carving, and Chana talked briefly about the holiday.

"I wanted to show this neighbourhood, especially the kids, that Judaism can be as hip as anything else out there," said Rabbi Gansburg.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Prayer: it really works

By RABBI DAVID CADOCH

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

In this week's parshah, Ki Tisa, we discover that tfillah (prayer) has the ability to annul a Heavenly decree and change the destiny of not only one man, woman or child, but an entire nation.

While Moses our teacher was receiving the Torah from Sinai, the people grew impatient wondering why Moses "did not fulfil their expectation of his coming from the Mount." We all know the episode quite well. The people, feeling somewhat abandoned and confused, approached Aaron, Moses' brother, and requested he build them gods to represent them.

One can well imagine the utter shock at hearing such a statement from a nation who had just witnessed astonishing miracles, including the Exodus from Egypt, the parting of the Red Sea and the destruction of the Egyptian nation.

Word of this betrayal reached Moses from the Almighty, who informed him that his (Moses') people had become corrupted. In a Divine fury, God then proclaims his intention to destroy the Jewish nation with a very articulate choice of words: "And God said to Moshe, I have seen this people, and behold it is a stiff-necked people. Now therefore, leave it to Me, that my Wrath may wax hot against them, and that I may annihilate them, and you I will make into a great nation."

Moshe's reaction to this was a supplication to God to reconsider this decree. "Vayechal Moshe et pnai HaShem" – "Then Moses supplicated before God, his God."

As the revered 19th-century German sage Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsh explains, the word "vayechal," although translated as supplication, has a root, "chale," that means to cause illness. The idea is that Moshe was "weakening the anger" of God in order to obtain His goodwill. Thus Moshe's "supplication" was really an effort to regain the favour of the Almighty by asking God to come down to our earthly level, to condescend to goodwill regarding Moshe's request for a Divine pardon.

To further affect this request, Moshe makes mention of our forefathers; "Remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel [Jacob] your servants, to whom You did swear by Your own Self and said to them: I will multiply your descendants as the stars of heaven."

Did Moshe succeed in his request to change the Almighty's mind and prevent him from annihilating us? Apparently so, since we are here this day, a vibrant nation, as the verse tells of HaShem's final decree: "Then God allowed Himself to be moved to altering His mind regarding the calamity of which He had spoken to bring about to His people."

Furthermore, HaShem also permits the continuation of the Divine mission: "And now, go, lead the people unto the place of which I have spoken to you, see, My angel shall go before you. But on the day when I remember, I will remember their sin against Me."

HaShem continually forgives His people. Hence we have a yearly "renewal" of His pardon, the reason we observe Yom Kippur the Day of Atonement as a fast day to wipe away our transgressions before God. Every year, the Almighty is consistently reminded of His promise to protect us and establish us in our Land.

Probably the most important lesson to learn here is that prayer has the power to change the Will of the Almighty. The Torah is teaching us that the Almighty wants our prayers addressed to Him in humility and in sincerity, as the Psalmist King David wrote in Psalm 145:18: "HaShem is near to all those who call upon Him, to all that call upon Him in truth." This prayer is said twice daily. Do we realize its beauty and power?

The Almighty hears all prayers on the condition that they are spoken in truth. For our tfillot to be effective, we need to want a relationship with the Almighty. From this desire to relate will awaken Divine compassion, and this is God's love for His creatures. Our prayers will be heard!

Do girls do better in their own schools?

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Frequently, when the question of single-sex schools is debated in Jewish education circles, the discussion is often cast in religious terms. Orthodox Jews will argue that, at a certain age, it's no longer appropriate to place boys and girls (or young men and women) together because of dilemmas of modesty and even sexual distraction.

Opponents argue, in a similarly moral tone, that this engenders discrimination and simply adds to a "segregationist" mentality within society. Obscured by framing the quandary in this context is perhaps the more central issue of whether boys and girls actually learn better in separate environments.

The evidence is mixed. Proponents of gender segregation point to research conducted by people such Dr. Ken Rowe. In a 20-year Australian study of 270,000 students, he found that boys and girls scored between 15 and 22 per cent higher on standardized tests when they went to separate schools. And a 2001 British study of almost 3,000 high schools and just under 1,000 grade schools showed that the biggest beneficiaries of single-sex education were girls, who almost uniformly performed better in such environments than in co-ed schools.

Others look at this research and believe that better test results in separate schools are clearly multi-determined – for instance, the students attending these schools are more economically well off and thus their families are more able to afford tutoring; their families have a bigger interest and investment in education; and so on.

As with all statistics, the devil is in the interpretation. Carol Gilligan, author of many well-regarded studies of how girls learn and the uniqueness of female moral behaviours, has repeatedly emphasized that something happens to female self-esteem as girls enter adolescence. From confident and self-assured nine-year-olds, many girls undergo a transformation that results in poor self-image and less confidence in their abilities.

One could argue that in an all-girls school, where there is no possibility of male harassment – or the subtler and perhaps more omnipresent phenomenon of sexual posturing and vying for approval – the impact on female learning is substantial. In an environment free from being "watched" – in the way voyeuristic preening regularly takes place in co-ed schools – girls can be safe to flourish. This is what professors Myra and David Sadker refer to as a situation in which "girls are the players and not the audience."

But it would be naive to imagine that same-sex schools eliminate the host of problems surrounding the contemporary adolescent girl, such as low self-esteem, eating disorders, or competitiveness over boys. One can surely not discount the primary influence of what takes place at home and the kind of role models that mothers and fathers provide.

One fascinating statistic to emerge from a study commissioned by the American Association of University Women was that low self-esteem was often more common among whites than among African-Americans, leading to speculation that black girls are often surrounded by strong women that they admire.

The situation is complex and the evidence is mixed, so the argument over the optimum atmosphere for learning continues.

Washington Jewish life

The Washington Diaries, 1981-1989* by Allan Gotlieb, McClelland & Stewart.

During the years 1981 to 1989, Allan Gotlieb was ambassador to the United States when Pierre Elliott Trudeau, John Turner and Brian Mulroney were prime ministers. He was highly successful – widely admired as a superb diplomat and lobbyist for Canadian causes. Intelligent, energetic, resourceful, he quickly learned how "to work the system" and emerged as a trenchant observer of the American political and social scene.

The diary extracts that follow all relate to Gotlieb's involvement in various aspects of Washington Jewish life.

June 12, 1984 – pork again

I call on Ed Zorinsky, senator from Nebraska, at his request. "Mr. Ambassador," he says, "the people of Nebraska are upset by your country's practices on pork. Pork is essential to the livelihood of Nebraskans, to their economic survival."

I pause for 10 or 20 seconds, look at him hard, and say, "Senator, don't you find it a bit strange, you calling me in here to lecture me about pork?"

The senator looks much taken aback. "Why?" he asks.

I reply, "A Jewish senator lecturing a Jewish ambassador about pork. That's not kosher."

At first the senator and his entourage seemed stunned. Then the senator started to laugh, and everyone broke up laughing.

July 20, 1986 – in the Hamptons

I bumped into Kay Graham and her granddaughter. Earlier, I'd heard an interesting story from Marc Leland about Kay. At a lunch at Warren Phillips's, with Kay present, Kati Martin announced that on a trip to her native Hungary a few years ago, she discovered she was Jewish. She found that her grandparents were Jewish and her parents converted to Catholicism (leaving Hungary in 1957) and never told her that she was Jewish. At this point, Kay informed the table, "I didn't know my father was Jewish until I was 21."

The conversation was flagging, so I said, "I understand you mentioned the other day that you didn't know you were Jewish until you were grown up."

She stopped cold. "You know I mentioned that to Kati yesterday. Today everybody is repeating it. Why is it people repeat everything I say? Why is there no privacy?"

All I could say was, "Well, Kay, if you say something at a lunch party at the Hamptons, people will assume you are not treating it as a secret."

Oct. 13, 1986

We went to Bill Safire's for his annual break-the-fast dinner following yom kippur. This is the fifth year that we attended.

Every year the crowd gets bigger, the wait to eat gets longer, the air gets stuffier, and getting a drink becomes more challenging. Safire herds his guests into the basement, picking out those he wants to talk to, and he ignores the rest. This year he sat upstairs in a cool room with Richard Perel, just back from Iceland, Len Garment, Abe Sofaer, and their spouses.

The most interesting thing about this annual get-together is discovering which Jews are coming out of the closet. The rule is at least one spouse must be Jewish to attend. I counted 120 Jews, 57 crypto-Jews, and 40 compromised or assimilated Christians.

Dec. 31, 1986

At dinner in the kitschy Sea View dining room, the music and performers' voices were so loud there was very little conversation. In between noises, talked to the Strausses about being Jewish. Mosbacher, Bob said, is Jewish and admits it. Cutler is and doesn't. Schlesinger is (or was) and doesn't. Novak is Jewish and anti-Semitic. Rowly Evans is a non-Jewish anti-Semite. I raised my eyebrows at this last one, but Strauss said that if I didn't know Rowly was an anti-Semite, I should be fired.

Pesach and prison

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Every Passover, Sid Kleiner spends the holiday with his family – his very extended family. Kleiner packs up his matzah, kippot and a guitar and goes off to prison. There, he conducts seders for Jewish prisoners marking Passover, the festival of freedom. As Passover approaches, a look at the work of these volunteers and at resources on the Internet for people who want to maintain contact with Jews behind bars. [http://tinyurl.com/2srtd5]

Although Jews constitute a small percentage of the 1.5 million prisoners held in the U.S., there are an estimated 8,000 to 10,000 Jews incarcerated in North America. One of the largest organizations devoted to assisting Jewish prisoners and their families on the outside is the Florida-based Aleph Institute. Since 1981, the institute has worked with wardens, chaplains and institutional staff at hundreds of state and federal institutions in a variety of ways to educate them and help them meet the needs of Jewish inmates. [http://tinyurl.com/2uhola]

To get a glimpse of what a seder behind bars looks like, take a look at an excerpt from American Prison: The Forgotten Jews. This documentary, currently in production, travels to a maximum-security prison where we meet a Jewish prisoner, Charles Johnson, who is serving a life sentence without parole for burglary. Johnson talks about freedom, Egypt and his own imprisonment. [www.shininglightproductions. com] As well, here's an essay about a seder conducted at Hendry Correctional Institution in Florida. [http://tinyurl.com/3ygfqb]

What special food can a Jewish inmate hope to receive for Passover? Policies and practices vary from institution to institution. Here's what recommended by Correctional Services of Canada on its page, Religious Diets – Guidelines for Faith Communities. "It is requested that each Jewish inmate be provided with the following foods for the Passover observance:

- salami – 5 lb.
- matzah biscuits – 2 lb.
- cookies – if certified kosher for Passover (1 lb.)
- TV dinners – kosher for Passover (one each day for supper)
- chicken - kosher (4 lb.)"

Chabad of Santa Barbara has designed a handbook for Jewish prisoners explaining what to expect and how to cope with incarceration, anti-Semitism and practising Judaism in prison. The information pulls no punches and warns of the loneliness, boredom and anti-Semitism behind bars, and the possibility of practising Jewish observances while in prison. [http://jewsinprison.org/]

After visiting prisons for more than two decades, Kleiner of the Florida-based Beth Tikvah Jewish Prisoner Outreach knows that Passover is the toughest time of year for inmates. [www.bethtikvahjpo.org] "Along with separation from family, there is a painful theme to the holiday – redemption, freedom from bondage and captivity. Jewish inmates gather around the seder table and declare that 'this year we are free.' It isn't easy to make this declaration with barbed wire, high walls and correctional officers in view. We seize this opportunity to remind our blue-garbed brethren that, in soul and spirit, the essence of freedom remains intact. One need not surrender one's soul and spirit to institutionalization." [http://tinyurl.com/2srtd5]

Another site quotes the Talmud in explaining the importance of this work, "We read in Tractate Berachot: Once when Rabbi Chanina became gravely ill, Rabbi Yochanan came by and sat down to visit him… Rabbi Yochanan remembered that Rabbi Chanina healed someone with the exact same illness. Rabbi Yochanan then said, 'Rabbi, why don't you heal yourself?' He responded, 'Prisoners cannot take themselves out of their own prison.' Thereupon, Rabbi Yochanan got up and healed him." [http://tinyurl.com/2edbt3]

Reena home answers families' respite needs

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Reena clients Ryan Garnet, 25, and Zachary Cohen, 26, are starting a brand new chapter in their lives.

The two young men, both developmentally delayed, are moving into a Reena home in Thornhill along with one other roommate.

The plan is for them to live in the house during the week, and for other people to move in on weekends in order to provide respite for those clients' families, said Ann Szabo, resource manager of outreach and respite services for Reena.

By offering three spaces for respite every weekend – no one will sleep in Garnet or Cohen's bedroom – Reena is able to offer respite care to 12 families each month, and that's sometimes the only rest the families get, said Szabo.

Garnet and Cohen have been attending Reena outreach programs for a number of years, and each took part in the agency's summer cottage program, she said.

"The two families came in through one door, our Sunday program and our respite cottage program – and I [always] believed they would eventually become part of our residential system," Szabo said.

Outreach exists, she said, to introduce families to Reena "in a gentle way. We build a relationship with them so that eventually clients can move into our homes. It's all about life planning."

There is a shortage of this type of housing in Ontario, she said, and often people have to wait until there is a crisis – when their parents become sick or they die.

The new house became available, Szabo said, after Reena was able to purchase it with funds from the sale of another house that had been left to the organization.

Zachary Cohen

She thought of the two young men because she knew it would be a perfect fit for them.

"We can't control our own spaces, because we are government funded. The spaces are assigned by an outside body, but we can advocate," Szabo said.

"It's a model that works for both of them. Their parents are willing to take them home on the weekend. Ryan and Zachary know each other, it's a kosher home and Jewish environment, and it's easily accessible to both families," she said.

Ryan Garnet

Shelly Cohen, Zachary's father, said he and his wife had been looking for such an opportunity, "because Zachary is 26 and we want him to develop as well as he can independently.

"Staff in the home will get them as involved in daily tasks as they are able to take on. They will do laundry and housecleaning, and buy groceries with staff support."

Zachary is a "theoretical chef," his father said. "He watches cooking shows and reads recipes, but because of his physical disabilities, it could be dangerous for him to [cook]. He will execute his skills in shopping and menu planning, however."

Ryan's mother, Hannah, said the Garnet family had also been waiting for such an opportunity. "I'm looking forward to Ryan becoming more self reliant."

Reena has changed her family's life, she said. "Ryan has taken part in a number of wonderful programs, and now his life will take on a whole new dimension. This is a major lifestyle change."

Szabo said there are many families in the community that are unaware of what resources are available to them.

"They need to be put on the radar, and realize they don't have to be alone. All they have to do is make a phone call."

Poverty mythbusters: the reality of the Jewish poor

By ROCHELLE KAHN
Jewish Family & Child

Poverty in the GTA's Jewish community is not breaking news. The fact that so many people, within and outside of the 180,000-member Jewish GTA, remain skeptical about its existence should be on the front page, according to Eric Kirsh, JF&CS Supervisor of Financial Assistance and Rehabilitation.

The statistics on Jewish poverty have remained quite constant. Some 20,000 Jews in the GTA live below the poverty line, 3,000 of whom are children. "But that official line is a tool for measuring the incomes of groups of people and does not necessarily reflect individual need," Kirsh said. "Poverty lines don't address those among us who teeter on the edge and we work with people who subsist significantly below accepted poverty line levels."

The low-income cut-off line for a family of four is $38,600. As Richard Cummings, Executive Director of JF&CS, points out, caring for that modest sized family within the GTA on that low level is a challenge and even more daunting when that family wants to keep its connection to Judaism alive.

"The truth is, living a modern Jewish life carries added costs," said Cummings. "Consider the year-round price of kosher food, let alone at Passover. Proximity to synagogues and other Jewish services necessitates living in certain neighbourhoods where affordable housing may be scarce and subsidized housing virtually non-existent. With the help of organizations like UJA Federation, Jewish Immigrant Aid services (JIAS), National Council of Jewish Women of Canada – Toronto Section, Kehilla and the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, we can respond to some of the need. But we're far from eliminating poverty or having the resources to reverse the root causes of it."

Jewish Family and Child provides supplementary financial assistance and rehabilitation counselling to hundreds of clients each year, supported by UJA Federation funding. "JF&CS strives to guide our clients successfully and safely back into mainstream community life. Our goal is to reinforce their sense of dignity and enable them to become self-sufficient," Kirsh said.

To facilitate that, Jewish Family and Child offers many forms of supports, ranging from individual counselling and group workshops, to employment strategies and access to vocational assessments. "Our Pathways to Employment Program, as well as our partnership with JVS Toronto, helps participants develop valuable job search skills," noted Kirsh.

Public perception of Jewish poverty still inhibits its eradication. "Recognizing the problem and accepting its existence is the first step," Kirsh explained. "It seems as if we've convinced ourselves that the idea of a Jewish child growing up poor is a relic from a distant time and place," he continued. "We need to face the compelling reality that thousands of our Jewish children are living among us in poverty. Right here, and right now."

How can you help ease Jewish poverty?
Your support for UJA Federation enables JF&CS to provide financial assistance and employment opportunities to those in need. If your synagogue, school or organization would like a JF&CS professional to discuss Jewish poverty with your members, call our Speakers Circle, 416. 638. 7800, ex 259.

Monica Auerbach leads Jewish Family & Child team north

Monica Auerbach, the new Jewish Family and Child's Director of York Region Services is no newcomer to the area. Her previous experience as Executive Director of Transitional and Supportive Housing Services of York Region has given her a first hand look at the area's growth — and growing pains. It's that insight into the region and its residents that drives Auerbach's dynamic vision for meeting the evolving needs of North America's most rapidly expanding Jewish population, the Jewish community north of Steeles.

Auerbach is all too familiar with how chronically under-serviced York Region has been, for both Jews an non-Jews. "New resources are poised to come into the area which will make a significant impact and open up even greater opportunities for JF&CS," Auerbach said. "We are building on a rich tradition of expertise and I am personally excited about working with the highly skilled professionals at all the branches of Jewish Family and Child."

New Director of York Region Services, Monica Auerbach

In recent years, responding to identified gaps in service, JF&CS has brought many of its programs to the York Region Branch, located in the Promenade Mall. "As the Jewish population increases, so do the ways we can serve its needs and contribute to maintaining its health and vitality," Wendy Wolfman, JF&CS Director of Family and Community Services explained. "Our vision for the region is holistic and we will continue to introduce supports for dealing with every phase of Jewish life, from school outreach to financial support, group counselling to hospice care."

With the development of the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, on Bathurst north of Rutherford - a UJA Federation Tomorrow Campaign project - Jewish Family and Child will be able to create an even stronger presence. "The Jewish GTA is entering a new phase of its history," said Wolfman "and the potential is remarkable. It's also a critically important time for Jewish Family and Child to extend its service reach and we are fortunate to have Monica's leadership guiding our efforts in York Region."

Plans are already well underway for the expansion of JF&CS into the new campus. "Jewish Family and Child will be a significant source of enrichment, support and safety for the York Region Jewish community," said Richard Cummings, Executive Director of JF&CS. "We are excited to partner with UJA Federation and our colleague organizations in building new capacity and contributing to the vitality of Jewish life in the region."

JF&CS program offers more than bagels
Bagel Club serves up a sense of belonging

Every Wednesday, for the past nine years, Morris* has had a place to go where he can share conversation over a light lunch in an informal, caring and comfortable environment. This might not seem like much to many of us who may take such opportunities for granted but, for Morris, it's enormous.

Morris struggles with mental health issues. The Bagel Club, a weekly JF&CS socialization and support group for adults in similar circumstances, is a place where he feels accepted and at ease. Darlene Horlick, a JF&CS social worker, has been organizing and facilitating the weekly get-togethers for nearly four years and stresses the positive impact the Bagel Club has on participants.

"Morris has social contacts here and when he comes to Bagel Club," she explained. "he feels a sense of belonging. Can you imagine what it might feel like to live on the margin, not being socially accepted or valued by society at large because of mental health challenges?" Horlick asked. "At the Bagel Club, people are recognized and valued for the unique contributions they make to the group."

The Jewish connection is extremely important. As Morris explained, "My neighbourhood used to be more of a Jewish area, but it has changed and I miss that. The Bagel Club keeps me connected," he continued "and 'in the know' about what's happening in the Jewish community. There are even copies of the CJN for us to take home."

Some of the members are socially isolated and the Bagel Club has become a highlight of their week. "Our members genuinely care about each other," Horlick noted. "In the past several months, two of our members died and the group rallied together to cope with the loss. We attended the funeral and shiva," she continued, "and we sent a group sympathy card. At one of the shivas, the family spoke to me about the impact the Bagel Club had on their loved one and described how the group had significantly improved the quality of his life. The group was very moved to learn they had the capacity to make such a difference."

Horlick urges people in the community to look beyond the surface and recognize the challenges individuals with mental illness face. "Everybody has the ability to shine if they're given the opportunity and the Bagel Club provides that."

Unique program supports transitioning students

By ROCHELLE KAHN
Jewish Family & Child

High school, for all its promise and potential, is a stressful time for teenagers, a time of significant change. Imagine the added challenge faced by students with educational, emotional or behavioural needs who must transition back into a community school from the structured and supportive environment of a day treatment facility like the Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre (JDD).

Diana Kirzner, JDD Transitional Worker, shared the story of how Melanie*, a recent graduate of the JDD program, navigated those hurdles. "Melanie is one of our JF&CS foster kids and she had a great deal of anxiety over where she would go and what she would do after leaving the Jerome Diamond," Kirzner explained. "She is a socially active girl but a low academic achiever. No one really knew if she'd graduate high school."

Kirzner, however, found a private school that was the right fit for Melanie and that even subsidized her tuition. "It was amazing to watch how Melanie thrived in the new school setting. Her recent midterm report showed a 78% average," Kirzner added. "Our Transitional Program enabled us to keep in contact with her teachers and make sure that, when important things were going on in Melanie's world, she could get the kind of consideration she needed. We were even able to help her find housing, when she was ready."

The JDD, a program of Jewish Family and Child, has long been helping young people overcome the issues that brought them there in the first place. Mark Mingail, Manager of the JDD, explained that "we have 34 students from grades seven through 12 enrolled in our program." "The kids come from a variety of backgrounds and circumstances, but all have challenges that prevent them from doing well in a standard classroom. "Our goal," Mingail said, "is to provide them with the skills they need to confidently reintegrate to community schools."

Until the Transitional Program pilot began in the spring of 2005, the JDD didn't have the professional resources to adequately support its program graduates as they moved on. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto stepped up to help fund the project but now, with the pilot nearing the end of its term, Kirzner is concerned about her students.

"To lose the Transition Program would be major step backward," she said. "If anything, we need to do even more to prevent kids who struggle from falling through the cracks."

For more information about the Jerome D. Diamond Centre or to find out how you can make a difference in the future of its students, call Mark Mingail at 416. 482. 3023.

Women's Voices, Women's Choices

Compelling Woman Abuse video debuts at JF&CS

The Jewish woman has long been revered as the heart and soul of the Jewish family. Ironically, that stereotype of her role in preserving peace in the home, Shalom bayit, may be one of the factors for many Jewish women that traps them in shame and secret silence. These women, living among us throughout our community, are victims of woman abuse.

Jewish Family and Child's Woman Abuse Program began 20 years ago in response to Jewish women in our community coming forward with the issue. Debra Feldman, Supervisor of the Woman Abuse Programs, is "thrilled" with the production of Jewish Family and Child's first video on the issue of woman abuse. The video, Women's Voices, Women's Choices, features a number of our clients who courageously speak out, talking about what abuse is and why it is so difficult to talk about," Feldman said.

Women's Voices, Women's Choices also explores the factors that make it so difficult for women to leave their relationships, as well as the impact woman abuse has on their children. As one of the women on the video explains, "Abuse looks different on different days. Everything can be perfect and it changes in a second. As the abuse increases, your access to the outside world becomes less and less."

Woman abuse is a complex, widespread and serious problem for the Jewish community and all of Canada. It has devastating physical, psychological and emotional effects on the women, as well as on the lives of their children. In 2005, the JF&CS Woman Abuse Program provided service to over one thousand women, men and their children. It is hoped that, through this video, JF&CS can help raise community awareness about this issue and its devastating impact on Jewish families.

"We betray our women when the tragedy of woman abuse is hidden away," explained Feldman. "Many people in our community still believe that the Jewish family is immune to abuse. The shame, the shande, is not in its existence. The real shande is that our community is not doing everything it can to address the barriers that keep abused women from coming forward."

JF&CS, in partnership with Jewish Women International of Canada and University of Toronto's Faculty of Social Work, is seeking funding for a research initiative that will help to identify the barriers that prevent Jewish women from seeking assistance, and develop strategies to tackle those obstacles. "Our community needs to take a strong stand on this issue," Feldman urged. "For too long, the issue of woman abuse has remained a woman's problem. Men in our community need to find a way to say that they will not tolerate abusive relationships. Participating in this quest for research dollars might be a perfect way for this to happen."

Since 1986, JF&CS has provided a spectrum of services for women experiencing abuse, including crisis, individual and group counselling, as well as advocacy, and instrumental services such as access to safe housing, and financial and legal assistance. "We must become better able to identify the women in our society who suffer behind closed doors," Feldman said. "When we lift the veil of secrecy around woman abuse in our community, we can more effectively help those at risk."

Women's Voices, Women's Choices was produced through the generosity of the Jonathan and Beverley Matthews Family Philanthropic Fund and Director/Producer Mark Pancer. The video, which will be shown to community groups in the GTA, is available to interested organizations. For more information, contact Debra Feldman at 416. 638. 7800, ex 270.

Parenting is hard work... in any language

New group available for Russian-speaking parents

Introducing a popular concept from one country to immigrants from another is far more complex than translating words from language to language. Respect for cultural differences and experience plays a pivotal part in effectively sharing information, be it a consumer message or family life education. As Anna Prudovski, a trilingual professional at Jewish Family and Child noted, "Explaining Canadian parenting values to a group whose cultural frame of reference is different will only be successful if participating parents feel comfortable. They will not open up to those new ideas if they feel their familiar practices are being judged."

Prudovski co-facilitates a new joint offering of her agency and Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS) called Parenting is Hard Work, a support group for Russian-speaking parents, many of whom are newly arrived from the former Soviet Union or Israel. JF&CS Supervisor of Group Programs Debra Feldman explained that this group is "aimed at families who may be at risk of coming to the attention of child protection because of family conflicts emanating out of differences between Canadian social and legal systems and those of their home countries."

The six session group for parents will help them understand their children and learn what they need to raise happy, motivated kids in the context of a new country with new laws and customs. Many topics covered apply to every Canadian parent, but special concerns dealing with the impact of immigration on children's behaviour will also be explored.

Anna Prudovski

While the parents meet, a concurrent activity group is offered for children aged six to 11, including supper, at no cost to the parents. Parenting is Hard Work is an innovative partnership with JIAS, also a UJA Federation funded agency. JIAS' Lea Soibelman is very enthused by what this program promises for the participants. "Not only are we able to provide the Canadian perspective on parenting, as well as cultural information, to Russian-speaking parents," Soibelman said, "the group encourages people from similar backgrounds to share their stories and their concerns in a welcoming environment."

Sensitive topics that are usually avoided

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In his column "The Islamification of Palestine" (National Post, Feb. 20), Father Raymond de Souza took issue with the fact the summit between Hamas and Fatah last month was held in Mecca.

As it is a city holy to Islam, Christians are prohibited from entering Mecca's boundaries, as they are from Medina, Saudi Arabia's other sacred city.

"Media reports were remarkably silent on the question of holding the Palestinian summit in a city where Palestinian Christians – a small minority, but historically active in Palestinian leadership – are barred by law… In two weeks of heavy media coverage, I have not seen the issue addressed."

Father de Souza was a fairly lonely voice in drawing attention to what he perceives as the systematic squeezing out of Christians from a Palestinian movement that is increasingly dominated by extreme Islamist influences.

Indeed, a similar fate is befalling minority Christian communities throughout the Muslim Middle East: Copts in Egypt, Chaldeans in Iraq, Christians in Syria, as well as Greek Orthodox and Roman Catholic Palestinians. All these groups are facing rapidly declining populations in formerly Christian areas, such as Bethlehem, that have become mainly Muslim.

Father de Souza calls for a return to the earlier years of the Ottoman Empire, when Christians "flourished" in a more tolerant atmosphere. He does not point out, however, that they existed only as dhimmi – a tolerated minority like the Jews, before Jews were expelled from many Arab lands upon the establishment of Israel in 1948.

Father de Souza's complaint about media silence is valid. This is a very sensitive topic that journalists tend to avoid, particularly in Palestinian areas, where some journalists claim they can't get Christians to speak publicly about their plight.

Interestingly, there was some inadvertent focus on this subject several weeks ago when it was revealed that Mohammad el-Attar, the Egyptian-Canadian accused by Cairo of spying for Israel in Toronto, was a convert to Christianity. There was some media speculation that el-Attar's Christianity, in addition to his homosexuality, made him a convenient target for Egyptian authorities hostile to both minorities.

In its Feb. 27 editorial, "El-Attar's fate in Egypt," the Globe and Mail argued that el-Attar's "confession" of being an Israeli spy, a charge that carries a maximum 25-year prison sentence, was almost certainly obtained under torture, as he has claimed.

Egypt alleges that el-Attar had been assigned by the Mossad to recruit Coptic Christian, Egyptian and Arab immigrants living in Canada. "Why Israel would want to enlist Coptic Christians, an oppressed minority in Egypt and in no position to acquire state secrets, is not explained," the Globe responded.

"The Egyptians have let it be known that the 31-year-old is a homosexual and a convert to Christianity; both would make him a pariah in the eyes of religious authorities and government officials."

The Globe concluded by calling on the Canadian government to "protest against this clear miscarriage of justice in the strongest possible terms."

Protest about el-Attar is the starting point for Tarek Fatah, writing in the National Post on Feb. 28. In "Just like Maher Arar. Except…" he describes a Feb. 14 event in Ottawa honouring Maher Arar, who underwent torture while imprisoned in Syria. Fatah rebukes Canadian politicians and Canadian Arab leaders for not using the occasion to also speak out about el-Attar's treatment in Egypt.

Fatah writes: "As our politicians denounced the confessions forced out of Arar under duress, another Canadian Arab was going through a similar ordeal. But not one speaker that night made mention of this Canadian languishing in an Egyptian prison."

Fatah faults not only the government for its lack of protest, but also Amnesty International, the Canadian Labour Congress, and the Muslim Association of Canada, the sponsor of the evening's event. Other major Canadian Arab and Islamic organizations did not respond to Fatah's requests for an explanation of their silence on el-Attar's case.

"Is it because el-Attar had 'confessed' to being an Israeli spy? Or was el-Attar ignored by the Islamic groups because he is a gay Arab man?" Fatah asked.

They are questions worth being asked – and answered.

Recovered Nazi-looted art to remain in Spain with ex-owner

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Nazi-looted painting restituted to the estate of the late German-born Montreal art dealer Max Stern will be staying in Spain indefinitely in the hands of private collectors – with the blessing of the estate's executors.

The recovery of Portrait of Jan van Eversdyck by 16th-century Flemish-born German Renaissance artist Nicolas Neufchatel, one of more than 200 artworks Stern was forced to sell through the Nazi-approved Lempertz auction house in Cologne 70 years ago, was announced last week by Concordia University.

It's the second work from that lot that has been returned to the estate, after a two-year search. The first, the painting Aimee, a Young Egyptian by 19th-century Frenchman Emile Lecomte-Vernet, was unveiled at Concordia in October.

The Neufchatel, an oil painting of a teenaged boy from a wealthy family, was discovered in a private collection, the Yannick and Ben Jakober Foundation, which has a small museum on the Mediterranean island of Majorca.

Concordia art history professor Catherine MacKenzie is credited with discovering the painting's whereabouts.

The Jakober family promptly acknowledged that the painting rightfully belongs to the Stern estate after being provided documentary evidence by the New York State Banking Department's Holocaust Claims Processing Office (HCPO), which is handling the estate's claims on the works liquidated at the 1937 Lempertz auction.

The foundation received the painting from a donor in 1996 and was unaware of its history.

However, the matter did not end there. The Neufchatel painting is protected by Spain's cultural heritage laws, which prohibit the painting from leaving the country without special permission. The parties agreed that title to the painting be transferred to the Stern estate, but the painting will remain on "permanent loan" with the foundation.

The estate calls it a "creative solution," while Ben Jakober termed it an "agreement of Solomonic proportions," said Concordia's Clarence Epstein, the cultural-property specialist heading the Stern art restitution project.

Epstein applauded the foundation for the amicable and fair way it settled the claim.

"We are delighted by the sensitivity and unequivocal co-operation of the Jakober family and their foundation team in our cause. They have truly risen to the occasion," said estate executor, lawyer Robert Vineberg.

The foundation holds a renowned collection of 143 16th- to 19th-century portraits of high-society European children, which the Jakobers, a British couple who are artists themselves, have been amassing since the early 1970s.

They created the foundation in 1993, and opened an exhibition space at El Aljibe, where the collection's most important pieces are permanently on view. They also routinely loan the works to other museums abroad.

Viennese-born Ben Jakober is Jewish and thus has a sensitivity to the issue of art lost by Jews through Nazi persecution, Epstein said.

Epstein added that allowing the Neufchatel to remain with its "possessor" makes sense because the goal of the Stern estate is to have the works' rightful ownership acknowledged and let the public see them, not to store or sell them. It's hoped the Neufchatel can still be toured despite the Spanish laws, and the estate is hoping to assist in that. The understanding is that the painting will carry information about its provenance when exhibited.

Epstein said he has not had the painting appraised, but he said Neufchatels have sold in the range of $10,000 to $100,000 in recent years.

The first Stern holding recovered is currently on loan for an indefinite period to the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts.

The Neufchatel portrait, painted in 1580, was resold twice since 1937, in 1977 and 1996, also through Lempertz. In neither case was the work's connection to Stern listed in the auction house's sales catalogue. The 1996 buyer gave the painting the same year to the Jakober Foundation.

Epstein was not surprised. "In fact, many of Stern's holdings have been repeatedly recycled onto the German art market in recent years, most notably at auction houses such as Van Ham, Villa Grisebach and Lempertz.

"While we are aware of the toll that the restitution issue is taking on the German art community, we remain committed to actively pursuing every single claim across Europe, the United States and any other jurisdiction."

The HCPO also hailed the goodwill and wisdom of the settlement. "The HCPO relies on open and constructive negotiation to achieve resolution for its claimants. This agreement is a wonderful example of these principles in action. We thank the Jakober Foundation and the Stern estate for their cooperation and creativity, and hope other claims can be resolved with the same spirit of mutual aid."

The official announcement of the recovery was made by Epstein last week at New York's Leo Baeck Institute, where the exhibition "Auktion 392: Reclaiming the Galerie Stern, Duesseldorf" opened. The exhibition, created by Concordia's fine arts department, premiered at the university in October.

While doing research for the exhibition, Concordia professor Catherine MacKenzie came upon an image of the Neufchatel portrait on the foundation's website.

A scale image of the Neufchatel, as well as dozens of other Stern holdings that are still missing, is on display until May 11 at the institute, which is dedicated to the study of the history and culture of German-speaking Jewry. Lempertz is one of the sponsors of the exhibition.

Concordia, McGill University and Hebrew University of Jerusalem are the three main beneficiaries of the Stern estate. Concordia is leading the Stern art restitution project, launched two years ago.

Before World War II, Stern owned an art gallery in Dusseldorf that he inherited from his father. After 1935, the Nazis forced him out of the art business. He is believed to have had to sell off about 400 works at prices well below market value, with the final 200 or so going on the block at Lempertz in 1937.

Stern came to Canada from Britain as an internee during the war and soon after bought the Dominion Gallery, which he owned until his death 20 years ago. He and his late wife Iris had no children.

האונס של אירופה

האוסקרים שלא ראיתם West Bank Story

Inner-city kids learn about Jews, tolerance

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty recently paid a visit to an Ottawa public school to launch a provincial program aimed at building character among students.

But even before the program was announced, the students at Charles H. Hulse Public School had embarked on a remarkable inter-ethnic adventure.

Of its 500 students – who hail from 75 countries – approximately 70 per cent are Muslim. Most had never met a Jewish person before, but some had nevertheless formed extremely negative and hateful impressions of Jews.

After hearing anti-Semitic remarks from some the students, Patrick Mascoe, a Grade 6 teacher at Charles H. Hulse, was dismayed.

"I thought it was sad that these kids had already figured out who they hated, based on ignorance," he said.

Mascoe decided to use a letter-writing course that he teaches to start a pen-pal project between students at the inner-city school and students at Hillel Academy, a local Jewish day school.

"I thought this would enable the kids to see how many similarities there were, rather than differences, between them."

At the end of the year, Mascoe invited the Hillel students to visit his school, where they engaged in collaborative, team-building games. In the afternoon, Holocaust survivor David Shentow spoke to the students about tolerance.

Mascoe said there was resistance from some Muslim parents at first, but eventually most of them came around to the idea, and in the program's second year, there was participation from the Muslim community as well.

This past fall, Mascoe's students were invited to join Hillel Academy students in painting tiles and making challah covers as part of the Mitzvah Day event at Ottawa's Soloway Jewish Community Centre. The two groups of students also visited Hillel Lodge, Ottawa's Jewish seniors home.

"The kids are proud of their school and proud of taking part in this. Our school is very multicultural, and at this age level, you can reach them about being respectful and tolerant and about character building," Mascoe said.

"I tell them you might not like everyone you meet, but you can't just dislike someone because of their race or religion."

Rabbi Jeremiah Unterman, director of education at Hillel Academy, agrees.

"It is very important that we teach our children to view others in a positive light, and at the same time we look forward to opportunities in which other people have a chance to interact with us and see us in a positive light," Rabbi Unterman said.

"I think that it is an imperative of the Jewish tradition, from the Book of Genesis, that we must treat every single person as being made in the image of God. That means that we have respect for everyone on earth.

"It is important to reach out to other people and we are happy when other people reach out to us to make friends. We are all descendants of one set of parents, which means we are all family."

As reported in the Ottawa Citizen, McGuinty said the provincial government plans to hold 12 forums across the province and spend $2 million to get schools more active in encouraging good citizenship. The aim is to avoid the social strife that has surfaced in several European countries as the result of cultural and religious differences.

"This being the premier's riding, and our school being a good example of the type of initiative he is promoting, he chose this as the venue to launch his program," said Charles H. Hulse principal Pino Buffone.

Yemenite Israeli activist claiming refugee status

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In April, the federal Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) is expected to hear an Israeli man's claim that he was persecuted in Israel because of his and his father's militant activism for a government inquiry into the fate of hundreds of Yemenite children who came to Israel with their families after 1948 and into the early 1950s.

Emanuel Meshulam, who is in his mid-20s, arrived in Montreal in late 2005 seeking political asylum, claiming he was persecuted by the Israeli police and Shin Bet, the secret service, because they wanted to intimidate him into silence on the issue.

He flew in with his wife and two children (they have since had another child), as well as his brother-in-law and his family, his lawyer William Sloan said. He described them as Orthodox Jews.

Israeli embassy spokesperson Ofir Gendelman said the claim is "ridiculous," but would not comment further at this time because "we are not familiar with the case."

Emanuel is the son of Rabbi Uzi Meshulam, who was sentenced to eight years in prison after a seven-week armed standoff with police in 1994 at his home in Yahud, near Tel Aviv, that ended in one of his followers being killed.

He and his followers had barricaded themselves in an attempt to force the government to set up a commission to investigate the disappearance of the Yemenite babies and children from immigrant and transition camps.

The elder Meshulam, whose parents were Yemenite, was founder of the organization Mishkan Ohalim, which claimed that the children were taken by officials and given to childless families, while the parents were told their children had died, but were given no death certificates or shown the graves.

In 2001, after a seven-year investigation, a national commission of inquiry unequivocally rejected claims that an official conspiracy existed to take children away from Yemenite immigrants and put them up for adoption. Two earlier inquiries came to a similar conclusion.

The commission reported that documentation exists for 972 of the 1,033 missing children, plus five were found to be alive. The commission found that the children were handed over to childless families by individual social workers, who apparently assumed the children were abandoned after becoming separated from their parents in the confusion of the massive influx of immigrants during that period, but it concluded that there was no Israeli "establishment" policy to separate them from their families.

The mortality rate was high among the children, and the commission did not find any instance in which parents were told their children were dead when they were not.

Despite his violent protest in favour of an inquiry, Rabbi Meshulam refused to cooperate with the commission.

Sloan said the younger Meshulam has been targeted by Israeli authorities because they fear he will perpetuate his father's cause.

Sloan said the younger Meshulam had been picked up repeatedly by the police for minor incidents "on technicalities." Meshulam has juvenile infractions, but no adult criminal record, he said.

Sloan said that police followed him, interrogated him and threatened him, and that he was beaten at least once by police. Sloan said he will present documentary evidence to back up these allegations.

Sloan said his client chose Canada "because it is one of the few countries that is at least open to granting refugee status to claimants from Israel."

Cotler defends abstention on anti-terror vote

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL— Liberal human rights critic Irwin Cotler abstained from the House of Commons vote last week on extending two controversial anti-terrorism provisions, even though he favoured keeping them, because the government motion did not sufficiently stress parliamentary review and "appropriate safeguards" against their abuse.

A government motion to extend sections of the Anti-Terrorism Act allowing preventive arrests and investigative hearings compelling individuals to testify was defeated 159 to 124. All opposition members voted against the motion, except Liberal MP Tom Wappel, who voted for it, and Cotler, the former federal justice minister. Twelve Liberals were absent.

The Anti-Terrorism Act was introduced in the weeks after 9/11 and passed five years ago. A "sunset clause" was attached to these two provisions stipulating that they would expire March 1, 2007, unless both the House and Senate voted to prolong them.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada regretted the motion was defeated and stated that they believe Canadians are less secure as a result.

Cotler said he did not vote for the motion on account of the "politicized and prejudicial fashion" in which it was proposed.

He was referring to the "impugning" of the reputation of Liberal MP Navdeep Bains by the government's bringing up a report that his father-in-law's testimony is being sought at the Air India inquiry, as well as the charge that the Liberals are "soft on terrorism."

Cotler is confident he will suffer no penalty for breaking ranks on the "whipped" vote. "Stephane Dion and I are good friends and former academic colleagues. He knew my position all along."

Cotler, the former public safety critic, was justice minister from December 2003 to January 2006.

Cotler believes there now has to be a "a comprehensive look at the entirety of our anti-terrorism law and policy" and an all-party agreement sought.

In addition to the Anti-Terrorism Act, the Security of Information, Immigration and Refugee Protection Act and the Canada Evidence Act need to be looked at, he said.

Cotler said his position on the provisions has not changed since the Anti-Terrorism Act bill was introduced. He said that at that time, he had insisted that the two provisions be reviewed by Parliament after a set period, preferably three years.

"I am exactly where I was initially. I proposed that they be sunsetted subject to parliamentary review and appropriate safeguards… My position remains the same as it was then," Cotler told the House before the vote.

He said he would have liked to have seen the government "compromise" by including recommendations made by House and Senate subcommittees, notably that the federal and provincial attorney generals include their opinion on whether the provisions should continue in their annual reports on the Anti-Terrorism Act and limiting preventive arrests to cases of "imminent" terrorist threat.

Cotler, however, said he feels there already was sufficient parliamentary and judicial oversight of the provisions' use to prevent violation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The fact the provisions were never used also points to the unlikelihood of their abuse, he said.

In any event, Cotler's opinion is that the two provisions were not extreme. He likened preventive arrest to peace bonds, which are used to prevent criminal violence, and investigative hearings to powers already contained in the Coroners Act and Inquiries Act.

CJC and B'nai Brith had urged the government to renew the provisions, believing they were needed to protect Canadians against terrorism.

CJC said security has been "significantly eroded" without recourse to the extraordinary powers they gave police and judges.

"These powers may be gone, but Canadians should not be lulled into a false sense of security – the threat these provisions were intended to combat is most assuredly still with us," CJC national president Ed Morgan said in a statement.

B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant called it a "setback" and criticized the opposition parties for politicizing the issue.

"When partisan interests trump national security needs, none amongst us is better off… This can only be seen as political theatrics at the expense of vital security concerns," Dimant said in a statement.

He said MPs should have been allowed to vote their conscience because security is a vital issue. Abstaining or being absent for the vote did not serve the interests of the public either, he said.

CJC and B'nai Brith said that Parliament must now work co-operatively to formulate new legislation to replace the two measures.

CJC suggested that additional safeguards could be put into place "to mitigate the potential adverse impact."

B'nai Brith is urging the government to come up with a "strong" anti-terrorism policy, calling on the relevant House and Senate subcommittees to review the existing anti-terrorism legislation and make recommendations that can be publicly debated. "Now is not the time for partisan politics, but for a unified, decisive and principled stance against terrorism."

The Canadian Islamic Congress and Canadian Muslim Forum, on the other hand, termed the defeat of the motion a "victory for human rights."

Cotler said he does not believe Canadians are any more vulnerable to terrorism than they were before March 1.

"We have a broad-based legal and policy framework in place to protect security," he said.

Halifax congregation hunts for rabbi — again

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — "The Rabbi is leaving! We have to find someone who will serve our needs and be willing to live away from the main centres of Judaism!"

It's an all-too-common theme in small Jewish communities, and Halifax is facing it again.

The largest Jewish centre east of Montreal is losing its Orthodox rabbi, Yehoshua Grunstein, who came to the Nova Scotia capital from Israel in August 2003 with a wife, young son and mountains of enthusiasm.

He is leaving the Beth Israel Synagogue in August to return to Israel with a wife, three children – the oldest, No'am, is ready to enter Grade 1 – and the same enthusiasm.

The main reason the Grunsteins are pulling up stakes is education. Halifax doesn't have a Hebrew day school and with none on the horizon, the rabbi says, "As parents, we ask ourselves if we are doing our very best to provide the children with the best possible Jewish and general education. We dare not do anything less then provide them with the very best."

Beth Israel board member Frank Medjuck is chairing the committee that's searching for a new rabbi, a role he has filled before.

As a boy in the 1950s and '60s, he saw rabbis leave with young families. The congregation then decided to seek rabbis whose children were university-age or older, and it retained one rabbi for 17 years and another for seven.

"While their days were fully occupied with their duties, we began receiving grumblings that there weren't enough activities, that young people were not attracted to the older rabbis, their sermons were too learned, and no one could understand them or keep awake," Medjuck says.

The board concluded, with the advice of resigning rabbi Saul Aranov, then in his mid-60s, that a young rabbi was needed to attract young members and get the shul moving again.

Medjuck says young rabbis are usually more energetic than what "we are used to. They are idealistic and want to make an impact. They're ready to conquer the world."

Rabbi Grunstein agrees.

"I came here with visions, and more came to fruition than not. We have had good programs, such as Lunch and Learn and various lectures. We now have a bimah in the middle, like many Orthodox shuls today, and an interactive website, which is as good as most I have seen. The one thing I didn't accomplish was forming a Hebrew day school."

He says a small community needs people, "more Jews, because any program with content quality needs a fair number of attendees to succeed. It's not as attractive with a handful. But Halifax has maintained a full Jewish life, with a daily minyan, kosher food available, a mikvah. It can be attractive for people seeking a quieter lifestyle."

He says a rabbi coming to Halifax must know that "he'll be isolated from larger communities, with no colleagues to talk with. He'll have to have enthusiasm and the energy to make Judaism attractive.

"And he has to have a clear vision, self reflection, to know if he's doing a good job, because the people are so nice here, no one will tell you off."

In Israel, Rabbi Grunstein will be education director at Amiel, an organization that trains young rabbis to serve in small communities around the world. He will assist Beth Israel in finding his replacement.

Medjuck says a small congregation asks a lot of its spiritual leader. He lists the responsibilities which, he says, are probably shared by other staff of congregations in larger centres.

He says Beth Israel expects its rabbi to be the final authority on issues pertaining to Jewish law and practice; to be ba'al koreh, ba'al tfillah, spiritual leader, speaker, preacher, teacher, community representative; to make visitations; be principal and teacher of the Talmud Torah; foster a junior congregation; teach bar and bat mitzvah classes and post-bar and bat mitzvah classes; be a programmer, office administrator; oversee kashrut in local supermarkets; maintain regular office hours; be a host in his residence; and administer conversions, the mikvah and the eruv.

Rabbi Grunstein did all of that, fulfilling many of his own and the congregation's expectations.

A co-operative Hebrew school with conservative Shaar Shalom Synagogue has functioned with his encouragement and active participation. His home and dinner table has been busier than ever before with congregants and students. His leading of services is energetic and lively, with modern peppy tunes.

Medjuck adds with a wry smile: "So we shall keep up the eternal search for the rabbi that just suits us right. If the Mashiach arrives first, he/she will have to meet with our search panel, board of governors, board of education, a general meeting of members, and eventually a negotiating session with the executive, where a good exchange of questions will take place, testing the rabbi's level of Jewish comprehension, like the usual question, 'Hey Rabbi, tell us just how Orthodox are you?'

"If a candidate can pass this, he just might be the Mashiach."

PHYSICS CHAMPS: From left, Simon Rozowsky, Davin Young, AJ Baron, Aaron Pellow and Jeff Somlo from the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's north campus are heading to Rehovot, Israel, to compete in the 2007 Shaheveth Freier Physics Tournament at the Weizmann Institute of Science. The competition called on each team to build a safe that only their teams can open and that operates on the principles of physics. The TanenbaumCHAT north team beat out four other teams from TanenbaumCHAT's south campus and Ulpanot Orot last week and will compete with Israeli teams on March 27 and 28 for the championship. Funding Fairness for O

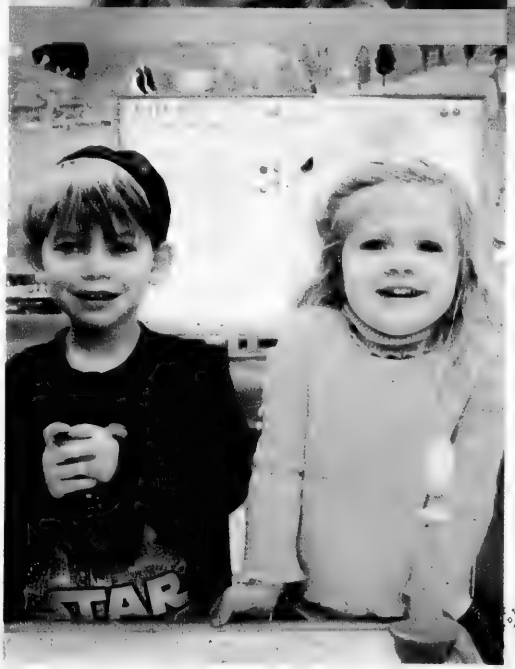
The Ongoing Campaign

For 30 years, organizations representing Ontario's Jewish communities have been advocating to secure government funding for our day schools and other faith-based schools. While there has been temporary success along the way, this situation remains a significant challenge for Ontario's Jewish parents and our entire community.

That's why Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, in conjunction with Jewish Federations in Ottawa, Hamilton and London, are working so hard with and for Jewish parents to achieve a long-term funding solution.

This is the first in a series of regular updates to let you know about the status of our efforts so far.



What We've Done

In order to reinvigorate our approach to this issue, we've spent over a year connecting with many interested groups to review past approaches and consider new alternatives. During this process, we have been meeting with:

- Senior representatives from all three political parties
- Day school officials in Toronto and across the province
- Day school parents
- Jewish community professionals and lay leaders
- Other faith communities

Their suggestions have guided us in developing a new strategic approach, which is based on five core concepts.

This report is published as a communi

ur Jewish Day Schools

Our Five Fair Funding Principles

✔Education is a core Jewish value and Jewish education is essential to the strength and vitality of the Jewish community, which is an integral component of the Canadian mosaic. Jewish day schools deliver high quality education that ensures our community's significant and unique contribution to society.

✔Jewish day school education, like public school education, is part of the public trust. To underscore this common characteristic, Jewish day schools should be within Ontario's public sphere of education.

✔To best ensure that all students are positive and effective contributors to society, Ontario faith-based schools should be treated in an equitable and fair manner, regardless of religious affiliation.

✔Just as schools in the public sphere follow criteria established by the Ministry of Education, Jewish day schools would also meet appropriate approved provincial criteria.

✔Public funding requires that schools adhere to accountability standards.

Jewish day schools would meet appropriate approved provincial accountability requirements.

Where We're Going

Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, other Ontario Jewish Federations and our education partners are advancing our new strategic plan at every opportunity on behalf of Jewish day schools, students and parents.
Here are some steps we intend to take:

- Expand and enhance our new website, www.fundingfairness.ca, to provide up-to-date information about education funding and profiles of our remarkable day school students.

- Increase communication with community members about fair funding.
- Conduct additional meetings with individuals of strategic influence to discuss our renewed approach and use every opportunity to responsibly present our point of view.
- Strengthen our dialogue with Jewish day schools and day school parents across Ontario.

Together we can sustain and strengthen Jewish day schools for generations to come, and help our children make significant contributions to Ontario and Canada.

Coast to Coast

Quebec City to mark 400th anniversary

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Jews have had a continuous presence in Quebec City since the British Conquest of 1759 and though their numbers were never great, they played a significant role in the capital's business, political and cultural life.

For untold numbers of Jewish immigrants, Quebec City's port was their entry into North America until the 1880s, when the St. Lawrence River was dredged to allow ocean-going vessels to sail to Montreal.

Yet, this story is little known, even to today's residents of Quebec.

Simon Jacobs, an English-born violist with the Quebec Symphony Orchestra who has lived in the city for 18 years, is hoping to change that. He is director-general of Exposition Judéo-Québécois 2008, a project to mount a six-month exhibition on the history of Quebec City's Jews as part of the official celebrations next year of the city's 400th anniversary.

The exhibition will run from May to October 2008 in the historic Gare du Palais, a VIA railway station that was chosen because it is in the area where most Jewish commerce took place over the past century, as well as near the port.

Jacobs said the goal is to show that Jews, a small minority, integrated into a mainly francophone, Catholic society, isolated from the Montreal metropolis, without losing their cultural and religious particularity. The theme of the project is "Same cloth, different threads: The Jews of Quebec," suggesting this duality. It's a valuable message, he feels, at a time when the province is vexed over how to accommodate immigrants and religious minorities.

The Jewish exhibition was one of just 36 projects chosen from about 325 submitted to the anniversary's organizing committee for official recognition and funding. It has received $85,000 from the year-long event's budget, as well as a $46,500 grant from the federal Department of Canadian Heritage and smaller private donations from the Canadian Council on Israel and Jewish Advocacy and the Maurice Pollack Foundation.

Jacobs says he needs to raise $160,000 more to cover the $450,000 he estimates the exhibition and related activities will cost.

The project has the endorsement of Federation CJA and Canadian Jewish Congress, whose archives department has been helpful, and Quebec regional director Joachim Normand sits on the exhibition's organizing committee. Jacobs is also working with the Musée des religions de Nicolet, and there are thoughts of touring the exhibition later on.

Jacobs is looking for former residents of Quebec City or their descendants who can share memories, or who have memorabilia, such as photographs, letters or information on family businesses, possibly for display.

The exhibit will have three main focuses: personalities from different eras, immigration patterns and Jewish culture in general.

It will accentuate the positive, although Jacobs said there may be references to anti-Semitic episodes, which in modern times included attempts to burn down Quebec City's only synagogue, Congregation Beth Israel Ohev Shalom, at the end of World War II.

Jacobs, 45, emigrated to Toronto in 1980 and lived in Montreal for two years before before going to Quebec City to take the job with the orchestra. Its conductor today, Israeli Yoav Talmi, is one of the Jewish community's newer members. Jacobs married his wife Catherine, a native of Chicoutimi, in Quebec City and they have three children.

The project's website is www.shalomquebec.com and the e-mail address is info@expojudeoquebec2008.com. The address for regular mail is 1035 rue du Mont St. Denis, Quebec, Que., G1S 1A7.

MEGILLAH READING: Forestdale Heights Lodge of B'nai Brith Canada continued its tradition of organizing a Purim Megillah reading and party at the B'nai Brith residence at 4300 Bathurst St. On March 3, graggers and Megillot with Hebrew or Russian translation were passed around to the over 100 residents who attended the event. After the Megillah reading, participants enjoyed refreshments – hamantaschen, potato chips and clementines. Moishe Goldstein, left, is seen here reading the Megillah, with Carl Zeliger, a past president of the lodge and organizer of the annual program.

Kenney, Cotler slam Iran

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Federal cabinet minister Jason Kenney said the Harper government "stands four-square" with the Jewish community in its concerns about Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's "genocidal intentions."

Kenney said at Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron last week that Canada "will pursue every possible avenue in concert with our allies to ensure that [Iran] does not come into possession of nuclear weapons, which could unleash unimaginable violence."

He said the government is looking at "every reasonable strategy" to thwart Ahmadinejad from his goal.

He described Ahmadinejad as "a man possessed of a maniacal hatred" and "a threat to world peace and security."

Kenney, a Calgary MP, became secretary of state for multiculturalism and Canadian identity in January, after serving as Prime Minister Stephen Harper's parliamentary secretary.

He shared the stage with Liberal human rights critic Irwin Cotler at what was described as a community denunciation of the Iranian regime's continued call for the destruction of Israel.

"Ahmadinejad is not the first leader since the Islamic revolution of 1979 to assert his hatred of Israel, but he is the first to say the goal of eliminating Israel is not some apocalyptical dream but attainable in our time," Kenney said. "And he is hell-bent to obtain the technology to do so. He must be stopped by the civilized world."

Kenney, however, believes Ahmadinejad's popularity is weakening and that an "underground" movement is working, at mortal risk, to replace him. He thinks "the vast majority" of Iranians, as "inheritors of the great Persian culture, would like to live in peace with the rest of the world."

Kenney said Ahmadinejad is not alone in this "kind of primal hatred" in that region, where other dictators are trying to maintain their dominance by portraying Israel as a "bogey man."

He also stressed his government's belief that Iran's leaders should be held personally responsible under international law for any crimes.

Cotler and Kenney have formed a personal friendship. They represented Canada at the funeral of assassinated Lebanese politician Pierre Gemayel in November, and both sit on the House of Commons subcommittee on international human rights.

Kenney said Harper understands that Iran is not interested in a two-state solution to the Palestinian issue, but "a final solution, in a perverted twist on history, that would complete the work Hitler began by eliminating the state that came into being as a haven for Jews."

Harper, he said, is unshakable in his support for Israel, because he "understands its existential fight," and he has told the Conservative caucus that he would not change his stance even if it means the fall of his government.

Cotler reiterated his call for Ahmadinejad to be indicted under international law for "incitement to genocide."

He said Canada, as a signatory to the Genocide Convention, has a responsibility to press the issue with the United Nations Security Council, the International Court of Justice and the new International Criminal Court.

Cotler and an international group of lawyers, including Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz, are preparing a "model indictment."

"At the very least, we should put Ahmadinejad on the watch list of our country and others as an inadmissible felon," Cotler said, as well as mount a divestment campaign against Iran, similar to that which was successful in ending apartheid in South Africa.

He also said Canada should support the Argentine government, which recently issued an arrest warrant for former Iranian president Akbar Rafsanjani for his regime's alleged sponsorship of the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires.

Hebrew U prof fears for rights in Israel

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's recent appointment of Daniel Friedman as justice minister is "regrettable," says Hebrew University law professor Alon Harel.

That's because Friedman believes the country's Basic Laws, adopted in the early 1990s to solidify democratic rights, aren't legitimate, since they were passed quietly without a broad public debate, Harel said Feb. 26 in a talk to a group from Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

But Harel believes the laws have become fundamental to Israeli democracy.

"I am worried that Friedman may try to destroy the existing legal system. His background and reputation is in private law. He really has little experience in public law." said Harel, who's on sabbatical and teaching ethics at the University of Toronto. (He also gave a lecture Feb. 27 at the University of Manitoba's law school.)

"When I grew up in Israel, there was a subtle understanding that the people in charge of the country were secular leftist European Jews, and the rest of the Israeli population had to accommodate to this. But this view of Israel has collapsed," Harel said.

"Israel has been fragmented into five tribes who have to coexist with each other in an uncomfortable way. The five tribes are Palestinian Arabs, ultra-Orthodox Jews, right-wing settlers, traditional Sephardic Jews, and European secular Jews," he said.

"Israeli society is far from being homogenous, and the Israeli legal system and jurisprudence has had to accommodate itself to this reality."

Prior to 1992, protection of individual rights was primarily based on the jurisprudence of Israeli courts, as Israel did not have anything resembling a bill of rights, Charter of Rights or a constitution, Harel said.

"During that period, the question dealt with by the courts was how the Jewish character of the state could be reconciled with individual rights," he added.

"My tribe, the secular European liberal tribe, is responsible for the legal change in 1992 which established two basic laws that have the ability to override statutes. The first… provides for freedom of human dignity and liberty, and the second… provides for freedom of occupation."

Israel's legal system has been heavily influenced by Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms, he said.

"Israeli law follows Canadian law in taking the approach that there are fundamental rights, but they can be justifiably infringed in order to reasonably safeguard other core values fundamental to society… Rights have to be balanced against each other," Harel noted.

"The major difference between Israel's basic laws and the Canadian Charter of Rights is that in Israel there was no constitutional moment. When the Basic Laws were passed by the Knesset, there was no real debate, and a lot of people didn't even know what was being done. That's why some in Israel called it the 'quiet revolution,'" he said.

"But then later on we had people in Israel saying that there was no legitimacy for these basic rights, as the country as a whole didn't really decide on this."

Harel said Friedman believes "that the Basic Laws are not really a constitution because they were not adopted in the right way."

But Harel disagrees, and he fears that this view may undermine Israel's legal system.

One thing Harel hopes that Israel does not borrow from the Canadian charter is its "notwithstanding clause," which allows provincial governments and Ottawa to override charter rights.

"A notwithstanding clause would not work in Israel, because the Israeli Knesset would not hesitate to use it all the time, whereas in Canada it has rarely been used."

Harel gave an overview of landmark cases in Israeli human rights.

Country has fragmented into five tribes who have to coexist with each other
—Alon Harel

In the area of equal rights for women, the seminal legal case is one involving an educated Ashkenazi Jewish woman who wanted to be a pilot in the Israel Defence Forces.

"The army refused to let her become a pilot, saying, among other things, that if she got pregnant it would cost them money while she was on maternity leave," Harel said.

The Israeli Supreme Court ordered the army to allow her to become a pilot.

The court is currently dealing with the issue of whether buses used by haredim can require women to sit at the back.

"The obvious solution to this problem is for the bus to be divided between the left side and the right side so that neither men nor women are required to sit at the back… then you wouldn't have this obvious hierarchy. Unfortunately, the ultra-orthodox rabbis have not accepted my solution," Harel said.

In the last few years, Israeli gays and lesbians have also made inroads in advancing the rights of same-sex couples.

"Recently, the Israeli Supreme Court has required the Ministry of the Interior to register a gay couple married in Canada as being married. The court said it would not rule on the validity of the marriage, but took the formalistic view that if a Canadian Court granted a marriage certificate, it had to be registered. The effect of this decision is that a gay couple gets about 95 per cent of the rights that a straight couple gets," Harel said.

According to Harel, the rights of Palestinian Arabs in Israel were advanced significantly by the case of a Palestinian couple who wanted to buy land from the Jewish Agency in northern Israel.

The Jewish Agency refused to sell the land to the couple on the basis that its role was to sell to Jews only, not Arabs. The issue was whether the government had the right to cooperate with a body such as the Jewish Agency that was discriminating on the basis of ethnicity. The court ruled that the Jewish Agency must let the Arab family buy land.

"Legally, this was not a difficult decision, but politically it was a major decision, because it had always been assumed that the Jewish agency could sell to Jews only," Harel said.

"Opponents of the decision thought that it was anti-Zionist. But the court recognized the changes that the agency had undergone from the days of the British Mandate, when it was buying land to advance the rights of a struggling Jewish minority, to the present time, when it is a powerful body that can be used to trample on the rights of other minorities."

In Harel's view, the most "radical" decision rendered by the Israeli Supreme Court involves the use of Arabic on public signs in Jewish cities such as Tel Aviv.

Although Arabic is recognized formally as one of the languages in Israel, signs in Tel Aviv have always been written in Hebrew and English only.

"In finding that the signs also had to be written in Arabic, the Israeli Supreme Court didn't emphasize the individual rights of Palestinian Arabs in Israel, but hinted at the notion of collective rights. It emphasized the notion that the Palestinian community ought to be welcomed as part of Israeli society."

Rae terms Israel's security wall problematic

He pointed to Palestine Media Watch's findings that criticized the Palestinian media's "brainwashing" content that promotes terrorism.

"If a society feels that shahid [martyr] is better than negotiations and coexistence, you've got problems," he said.

Asked to comment on Israel's security barrier, Rae pointed to concerns that Israel was using it to unilaterally establish permanent borders without resort to negotiations. He said that while the barrier is not illegal, it divides communities and if it's permanent, it would be problematic.

Kent said he did not like separation walls in Belfast or Cyprus, and "I don't like the wall in Israel, but to call it the apartheid wall is rhetorical flatulence."

Kent said the barrier had reduced terrorism, but "I have not seen anything from the Israeli government [to say] that it is permanent."

Berlin said there is no evidence the barrier had stopped suicide bombings. He quoted unnamed sources on Israel's "extreme left" who assert its creation is preparing the groundwork for a "transfer" of Palestinians.

The panel discussion was sponsored by Canadian Friends of Peace Now and Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Silence kills

By JOSH SCHEINERT

Silence kills. No one knows that better than us. For 12 years beginning in 1933, the world was too silent. Six million Jews later, it vowed "never again." Yet, for one reason or another, we recently marked the fourth anniversary of another silence. As in the past, this silence is killing people – 400,000 and growing, to be precise.

It boggles the mind to think that we have remained as silent as we have over the situation in Darfur. The time for niceties has passed. Now is the time for honest self-reflection on our lack of action, the consequences that have ensued and how we can turn ourselves around.

We are a community known and admired for our ability to organize and mobilize, but it cannot just be about Israel, since our values are global in scope. Israel is one of the pillars of what it means to be a Jew in the Galut (Diaspora), but, at the same time, we must not forget the third of Raban Gamliel's pillars: Torah, avodah (worship) and gmilut chasadim (acts of kindness).

Darfur needs our acts of chesed.

There are three immediate and simple steps we can take to alleviate the victims' suffering and help bring about a quick end to this crisis.

The first step is to raise funds to begin feeding large numbers of displaced persons – there are three million. Aid efforts to feed these refugees are severely hindered as international donor fatigue has set in. The lack of funding has threatened what UN Under-Secretary General for Humanitarian Affairs Jan Pronk has termed the "life support system" keeping Darfuris alive.

The World Food Programme has placed many of these refugees on 1,000 calorie a day diets because that is all they can afford. No doubt there are survivors among us who remember what 1,000 calories a day feels like. It is inhuman. What's worse is that these meagre rations are not being handed out in ghettos or camps aiming to decimate a population; they are what we have had to resort to in an effort to save these people.

It is time for more Jewish organizations, community groups and individuals to begin speaking out, demanding action from our elected officials

The second way in which we can help is to take a more hands-on approach with Ottawa. We have the ear of this government. It is time for more Jewish organizations, community groups and individuals to begin speaking out, demanding action from our elected officials. As Jews who pride ourselves on our acts of kindness and generosity, we must demand that our country reach out to the world's most destitute and helpless population.

How many synagogues have held town-hall meetings with their congregation and MPs to talk about ways Canada can play a more meaningful role in Darfur? The answer is, too few, but we can turn this around. We just have to want to.

The third way we can help the situation in Darfur strangely enough involves Israel. Israel is currently holding just under 300 refugees from Darfur in prison cells and remote kibbutzim throughout the country. The reason is that the country refuses entry to refugees from enemy states, of which Sudan is one. There can be no stance more hypocritical than the current Israeli position on these refugees. They are not enemy combatants. They are the 21st century's faces of our ancestors knocking on the doors of Great Britain, the United States or Canada, only to be told that "none is too many."

Canadian Jews must join the chorus of Israelis led by Holocaust scholar Yehuda Bauer, Yad Vashem director Avner Shalev and countless others to demand that the Israeli government expedite whatever procedures it must to ensure that these refugees are granted the safe sanctuary that was never given to our relatives. It is no coincidence that they came to Israel's doorstep.

Reaching out to Darfuris is the essence of Jewish values. In the United States, the American Jewish World Service has been instrumental in bringing Darfur to the radar screens of its government. It is time that Canadian Jews joined this effort. If we opt for collective action, the results could be tremendous. If we maintain our collective silence, the results will be disastrous.

Young entrepreneur's website wins an award

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Daniel Warner hasn't finished getting an education, but he's already being recognized for his business venture, UniversityParty.ca.

Last month, Warner, 23, was one of two students to win the 2007 Ontario Student Entrepreneur Competition, which is sponsored by Advancing Canadian Entrepreneurship (ACE) and CIBC Small Business, for his website that aims to connect businesses to students and students to one another through an interactive online community.

The awards are given out annually to full-time Canadian post-secondary students who operate a business.

For the first phase of the competition, students from each province presented their business model to a panel of judges. The winners of the provincial competition will go on to compete in the regional competition in Ottawa on March 16 and could win a $1,000 cash prize. The final round of the competition is the national championship that will be held at the ACE National Exposition in Toronto from May 7 to 9. The national champion will receive a $10,000 prize and will represent Canada at the Global Student Entrepreneur Awards this fall.

Warner, who earned a bachelor of business management from the University of Western Ontario and is currently a full-time Seneca College post-graduate student, founded UP Media Group Inc., in March 2005, to provide companies the opportunity to reach the 18- to 25-year-old Canadian student market.

"UniversityParty.ca is Canada's largest student web portal. What we're doing with that right now is streamlining all the content that goes on on all campuses, all the events, all the fundraising opportunities, all the student initiatives. If you go on our website, you're going to find thousands of events across Canada that are either initiated by individual members, by student groups or charitable groups," he said, adding that he employs 40 students in 11 Canadian cities and has a membership of 20,000.

Daniel Warner

Although Warner loves being an entrepreneur, it wasn't until his final year of high school that he discovered his passion.

"At CHAT [Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto], I was all about the sciences. I was always taking the physics and the chemistries, always a year in advance. I went to Westmount [Collegiate] for my OAC [Ontario Academic Credit] year, back when they had OAC. I took business administration, I had a good teacher, and I was introduced to everything from finance to marketing to human-resource techniques. I thought, 'why have I not been doing this since Grade 9?' It really opened up a new door," Warner said.

As a university student, Warner became involved with Hillel and eventually became the president of AEPi, a Jewish fraternity.

It was his experience with these organizations that opened his eyes to a need for an online student network.

He said he first came up with the concept for UniversityParty.ca when he thought about creating a site called WesternParty.ca for UWO students who wanted to be up to date about campus events and parties.

Warner figured that if it would work in London, it would work in other communities as well.

With the success of UniversityParty.ca, Warner wants to launch another site aimed at the Jewish student community called ShmoozeToronto.com, which he also hopes will branch out into the rest of Canada.

"I felt that when I was in London, everyone knew what was going on. Whether it was Chabad or Hillel or AEPi, if someone Jewish was doing something cool, everyone would know about it by the end of the day. Here [Toronto], there is either so much going on, or not enough going on and people are finding it harder to find out about it," Warner said.

He said that his vision for ShmoozeToronto.com is that it will feature events, fundraisers and Israel opportunities for students and recent graduates aged 21 to 29 who want to stay connected to the Jewish scene.

Warner said he feels encouraged by the positive feedback he received from the 13 judges at the provincial competition last month and is looking forward to the regional championship in Ottawa, where he will compete with three other people for the central Canadian crown.

"They loved the charitable foundation, they liked our reach, how well established we are, and they liked our corporate advertisers, like Rogers, our title sponsor. They were impressed by that," he said, adding that Lava Life, Bank of Montreal, the Toronto Raptors and the Toronto Blue Jays are also on his list of corporate sponsors.

He attributes some of his success to his attitude toward taking chances, which was instilled in him by one of his mentors, Daniel Debow, who is an AEPi alumni and one of the founders of WorkBrain.com, a Canada-based company that develops software to help organizations manage their work forces.

He said that he heard him speak at Schulich School of Business at York University a few years ago.

"During his whole speech about his life to date, the one thing that really stuck with me was his message that the worst thing someone can say to you is no," Warner said.

He has a full plate for the next few years. Aside from running the business full time, he also hopes to get an MBA, and is even considering a career in politics.

"After taking on leadership roles on campus, I've gotten a taste for leadership and making things happen, so I think politics might be in the cards."

Israel's Eurovision entry stirs pop contest controversy

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — It may be the ultimate in forgettable mass-communications kitsch, but the Eurovision Song Contest has special resonance for many Israelis. Founded just a few years after World War II, the annual competition is an opportunity for Europeans to flaunt an ever-changing array of pop songs that seem to serve as alternative national anthems – devoid of any overt nationalism – and then choose a winner through an elaborate phone-in vote.

That sense of dizzy continental togetherness is catnip for Israel, which was allowed into Eurovision in 1973 and treats the event as part of a perennial campaign for acceptance abroad.

But Israel's entry for the 2007 songfest has triggered controversy for lyrics that seem to touch on the most combustible of current crises – Iran's nuclear program.

Titled Push the Button, the song speaks of "crazy leaders in the world who are trying to trick us" and "rockets flying and landing on me."

A line from the chorus becomes even more specific: "I wanna have a lot of fun, just sitting in the sun, but nevertheless, he's gonna push the button."

Contributors to a BBC chat room were quick to discern a reference to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, whose calls for Israel to be "wiped off the map" and Holocaust denial have stirred international concern that there could be a cataclysmic war if his country attains the means to produce nuclear weapons.

In Finland, where this year's Eurovision takes place in May, objections were directed at Israel and its band of choice, hip-hop cum urban-pop group Teapacks.

"It's absolutely clear that this kind of message is not appropriate for the competition," said Kjell Ekholm, a Eurovision organizer, adding that contest officials would convene to discuss whether to disqualify Push the Button.

Israelis remained defiant. The Israel Broadcast Authority, which selected the song last week, said it had submitted the lyrics to the European Broadcasting Association and encountered no problems.

Teapacks' lead vocalist Kobi Oz, meanwhile, argued that Push the Button, which also contains lyrics about crime, should be appreciated for capturing the Israeli national mood.

"The song has a line that talks about 'several crazy leaders.' If and when the British read the song, they decided to draw the conclusion that it aimed at Iran," Oz told Ma'ariv. "It turns out that the BBC thinks that Ahmadinejad is crazy. We didn't mention names.

"The State of Israel has gone through enough, so that it can laugh at terrorism. The Israelis chose the song because that is the best way – not to be afraid, but to laugh in their faces," he said.

Push the Button is not the first time Israel has flirted with politics at Eurovision.

In 2000, the Israeli band Ping-Pong delivered Be Happy, which basically was a love song to Syria coming against the backdrop of failed U.S.-led efforts to broker peace between Jerusalem and Damascus. No one complained then.

Indeed, many Israelis are convinced that their fortunes at Eurovision depend on the state of their rapprochement efforts with Middle East neighbours.

The landmark Israeli-Egyptian peace talks of 1978-79 coincided with two successive victories by the Jewish state at Eurovision. The third and last victory was in 1998, the height of optimism at the prospects of the Israeli-Palestinian interim peace talks.

Israel had additional help in the form of its singer that year, the transsexual Dana International, whose vamping delighted liberal Europeans while stirring rancor among religious conservatives back home.

Even if Push the Button passes the political correctness test in Helsinki, it may be challenged on another front – originality.

Ma'ariv reported that the song, which is being performed in Hebrew, English and French, contains elements that recall a song from the 1936 Charlie Chaplin film Modern Times.

But the newspaper quoted Teapacks members as saying it was a matter of inspired homage rather than plagiarism.

"There is a resemblance, but it is extremely small," one musician said. "We're talking about a half-note exactly. The Eurovision rules are clear, and there will be no legal problem with the song."

Iran talks preferable, force possible, Obama says

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

Feature

American Senator Barack Obama of Illinois started his first major Middle East policy address with a joke about the "small gathering" of his American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) friends – some 800 people packed into a hotel ballroom in downtown Chicago.

But at the AIPAC dinner on March 2, the man seeking the Democratic presidential nomination was also aiming his message at Washington, Tehran, Jerusalem, Ramallah, Damascus and the liberal-left landscape occupied by his party's base.

The trick was to project toughness and closeness to Israel while keeping an open mind about how to deal with its most dangerous enemy, Iran. In addition, the speech aimed to show that the senator, who has held national office for barely two years, is no foreign-policy novice.

There were, to be sure, reassuring messages for AIPAC, the pro-Israel lobbying powerhouse: nothing, including a military option, should be off the table in dealing with Iran's nuclear threat, Obama said, and the Palestinian factions' recent agreement to form a national unity government was "not good enough" because it failed to renounce terrorism or recognize Israel. But Obama made clear that he wasn't going to stray from the sentiments of a party base that is profoundly wary of any U.S. belligerence in the Middle East, blaming Bush administration policies for the Iraq quagmire.

Tough talk on Iran from another Democratic hopeful, former North Carolina senator John Edwards, rebounded against him, and Edwards spent weeks backtracking from his pledge at Israel's Herzliya conference this winter to use force if necessary to face down Iran – a posture now seen as a costly early campaign blunder.

Obama learned from Edwards' experience. In a speech made available to reporters before his appearance, he coupled his warnings about the military option with his preference for peaceful engagement.

"While we should take no option, including military action, off the table, sustained and aggressive diplomacy combined with tough sanctions should be our primary means to prevent Iran from building nuclear weapons," he said.

Tough-minded diplomacy, he said, "includes direct engagement with Iran similar to the meetings we conducted with the Soviets at the height of the Cold War, laying out in clear terms our principles and interests."

The Bush administration – backed strongly by AIPAC – has, until recently, avoided engagement with Iran, believing it would merely reward a regime that stubbornly resists transparency about its nuclear program.

But this week, the White House agreed for the first time to participate in multilateral talks on Iraq that would include Iran and Syria among a host of regional players.

Obama had other messages aimed at the base whose support he needs if he's to win the Democratic nomination. Much of the speech outlined his plan for a U.S. troop withdrawal from Iraq, something the AIPAC crowd greeted with applause. U.S. Jews overwhelmingly believe the Iraq war was a mistake, according to polls.

Barack Obama

Obama framed his opposition to keeping troops in Iraq in terms of the danger the U.S.-led occupation poses to Israel.

"A consequence of the administration's failed strategy in Iraq has been to strengthen Iran's strategic position, reduce U.S. credibility and influence in the region, and place Israel and other nations friendly to the United States in greater peril," he said. "These are not the signs of a well-paved road. It is time for profound change."

Obama advocates a phased deployment starting in May and ending in March 2008, keeping some troops in neighbouring countries.

In some areas, Obama veered away from AIPAC talking points and toward a Democratic party that still embraces the deep involvement in Middle East peacemaking that characterized the Bill Clinton era.

"For six years, the administration has missed opportunities to increase the United States' influence in the region, and help Israel achieve the peace she wants and the security she needs," he said, repudiating George W. Bush's policy of waiting until the parties were ready for bold moves – a policy AIPAC also favours.

Obama also warned that Israel would have to make major concessions.

"Israel will have some heavy stones to carry as well," he said. "Its history has been full of tough choices in search of peace and security.

"Yitzhak Rabin had the vision to reach out to longtime enemies. Ariel Sharon had the determination to lead Israel out of Gaza. These were difficult, painful decisions that went to the heart of Israel's identity as a nation."

Still, woven through the speech were subtle signs of appreciation for Israel from someone who, a little more than two years ago, was a state senator from Illinois.

He began by describing an experience the pro-Israel lobby wishes for every aspirant for public office: a flight over Israel.

"The helicopter took us over the most troubled and dangerous areas and that narrow strip between the West Bank and the Mediterranean Sea," he said of his first visit to Israel in January 2006. "At that height, I could see the hills and the terrain that generations have walked across. I could truly see how close everything is and why peace through security is the only way for Israel."

Obama also did not stint in expressing disappointment over the national unity deal that Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who heads the relatively moderate Fatah party, struck last month with the ruling Hamas terrorist group.

"The reports of this agreement suggest that Hamas, Fatah and independent ministers would sit in a government together, under a Hamas prime minister, without any recognition of Israel, without a renunciation of violence and with only an ambiguous promise to 'respect' previous agreements," he said. "We must tell the Palestinians this is not good enough."

Obama singled out Syria and Iran for arming Hezbollah, the Lebanese terrorist group that launched a war against Israel last summer, but he also chided the Bush administration for allegedly not allowing Israel to pursue Syrian peace overtures.

"We should never seek to dictate what is best for the Israelis and their security interests," he said to applause. "No Israeli prime minister should ever feel dragged to or blocked from the negotiating table by the United States."

Canada ranked high for protecting human rights

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An organization that monitors human rights developments at the United Nations ranks Canada number 1 among member states in the General Assembly and the UN Human Rights Council (HRC) – in large part for its votes on resolutions attacking Israel.

UN Watch last week released a report, Human Rights Scorecard: Canada at the UN in 2006-2007, in which Canada scored 12 points, ahead of the Czech Republic, Finland, Germany, the Netherlands, France, Poland, Romania and the United Kingdom, each with eight points.

A host of Islamic countries, including Algeria, Bahrain, Jordan and Pakistan were at the bottom of the rankings, along with China, Cuba and the Russian Federation, each with -11 points.

Canada drew top marks for its consistent voting pattern and for the statements by Canadian diplomats in support of human rights, said Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch. Neuer presented the report to government and opposition MPs in Ottawa last week. As part of his visit to Canada, he also spoke at a human rights conference in Winnipeg hosted by former foreign minister Lloyd Axworthy and he addressed a public meeting in Toronto at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, co-sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada.

The report noted the 47-member HRC considered only 10 resolutions addressing specific countries. Eight were "harsh condemnations of Israel, and two [were] soft, non-condemnatory resolutions on Sudan."

UN Watch found that "the council adopted seven one-sided, Organization of Islamic Countries resolutions condemning Israel for human rights violations without addressing other parties' violations and without acknowledging Israel's legitimate concerns. Many were also redundant to resolutions passed at the same time in the General Assembly. Canada commendably voted 'no' on all of them, the only council member to do so."

Neuer said the report's findings demonstrate "our recognition at UN Watch that Canada has a leadership role at the UN HRC."

With the absence of the United States and Australia and with other western democracies – particularly European Union countries – "waffling," it falls to Canada to be an outspoken advocate for human rights, he said.

"Canada, by default, is one of the few western democracies that is active for a meaningful council."

Commenting on the study, Foreign Affairs spokesperson Rodney Moore said, "Canada is proud to have ranked first in this report for our consistent support of positive human rights initiatives in the UN as well as for strong opposition to initiatives aimed at weakening human rights protection.

"Canada will continue to work closely with all stakeholders to ensure that the UN human rights system – including the new HRC – lives up to its promises and ensures concrete results on the ground."

The report compares Canada's actions to those of other countries "on a selection of votes considered the most significant by council stakeholders. These include most prominently the 'name and shame' resolutions, where a handful of the UN's 192 countries are singled out for censure, along with other resolutions that touch on bedrock democratic principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights," the study stated.

UN Watch commended Canada for its position on Darfur, where it "was at the forefront of a minority of a democratic bloc of 11 countries that demanded strong actions and a special session for the victims," for its opposition to an Algerian initiative to impose a code of conduct on the council's 41 independent human rights monitors and its defence of freedom of expression in the face of attempts by the Islamic group to prohibiting the media from defaming "religions and prophets."

At the General Assembly, Canada led a resolution to hold Iran to account for torture, arbitrary arrest and repression, and it joined in citing rights abuses in Belarus, Burma and North Korea.

UN Watch allotted numeric scores of one point for countries taking a positive position at the HRC, zero for abstaining or being absent for a vote and minus-one for a negative position. Council members were rated on 14 key actions since June 2006.

Despite Canada's high score, there is room for improvement, Neuer stated. UN Watch looked at the 19 worst human rights abusers as determined by Freedom House, an independent democracy advocacy organization, and examined Canada's speeches and votes at the HRC and the General Assembly. Canada either voted positively (gaining a point) or made statements concerning the rights abusers in only six cases. "However, there were so many worst of the worst countries – 13 of the 19 – for which Canada took no action at all."

Canada was silent on China's "violations of civil, political and religious rights," on "Fidel Castro's [Cuba] police state," "Saudi Arabia's refusal to allow women to vote or drive a car" and "its state-sponsored schoolbooks that teach children to hate Christians and other non-Muslims" and repression in Zimbabwe.

"There are many times Canada can speak out," Neuer said. "It's important to the victims. It has a potential impact to put governments on notice that the world is watching."

U.S. Congressional committees to study resolution on Jewish refugees

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A bi-partisan resolution that addresses the plight of Jewish refugees from Arab lands has been referred to committees in both the U.S. Senate and U.S. House of Representatives.

The progress of the bills through the law-making process is an important indicator that the Democratic-controlled Congress "has embraced [the resolutions]" in the same way the Republican-led Congress did, said Stanley Urman, executive director of Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC).

The resolutions, which are nearly identical, are co-sponsored by four senators and four congressmen representing both political parties. Their operative clauses urge U.S. President George W. Bush to instruct American diplomats participating in international fora to raise the question of Jewish, Christian and other refugees from Arab and Muslim countries whenever Palestinian refugees are brought up.

The "Sense of the Senate" resolution also calls on the U.S. government to support "the position that, as an integral part of any comprehensive peace, the issue of refugees and the mass violations of human rights of minorities in Arab and Muslim countries throughout the Middle East, North Africa and the Persian Gulf must be resolved in a manner that includes consideration of the legitimate rights of all refugees… and recognition of the losses incurred by Jews, Christians and other minority groups as a result of the Arab-Israeli conflict."

Urman said JJAC had pushed for the resolutions as a way of addressing the historical wrong done to more than 850,000 Jews.

"We want to ensure there is recognition that two [refugee] populations emerged in the Middle East. The world recognizes that Palestinians were refugees. We want them to recognize there were Jewish victims as well," he said.

The resolutions are not meant to dismiss the claims of Palestinians, he continued. "The resolutions are an attempt to restore balance. They are not against the Palestinians."

Urman said the JJAC's efforts to publicize the historical record will not end at the U.S. Congress. "We want to make sure all members of the Quartet know about it."

Last year representatives of the European parliament and the European Commission were briefed on the issue, as were Russian officials. (Russia, the United States, the United Nations and the European Union make up the diplomatic "quartet" that backs the "road map" peace plan.)

"We want to make sure when it comes to table they're not hearing about it for the first time," he said.

Urman noted that final status talks under the "road map" calls for a just and fair resolution of the refugee issue.

In addition, UN Resolution 242, the Egypt-Israel peace treaty and other international documents are not limited to Palestinian refugees. They can be read as referring to Jewish and other refugees from Arab lands, he said.

One of the House sponsors, Representative Jerrold Nadler, a Democrat from New York, said "the suffering and terrible injustices visited upon Jewish refugees in the Middle East needs to be acknowledged. It is simply not right to recognize the rights of Palestinians refugees without recognizing the rights of Jewish refugees, who in fact, outnumbered their Palestinian counterparts."

(UN records cited by JJAC state that 726,000 Palestinians were made refugees during the conflict with Israel, less than the number of Jewish refugees.)

"This measure underscores the need to address the refugee issue in a comprehensive and balanced manner," said Representative Ileana Ros-Lehtinen," a Florida Republican who is a bill co-sponsor. "The displacement of Jewish, Christian and other minorities living in predominately Arab countries receive scant attention, and yet remain a stumbling block in the road to a sustainable long-term peace in the Middle East. It is essential that the plight of these communities be integrated into discussions of any comprehensive settlement regarding the issue of refugees."

"There can be no true and lasting peace in the Middle East unless the legitimate claims of all refugees displaced by the years of conflict are recognized by the international community," said Senator Norm Coleman, a Minnesota Republican and one of the resolution's Senate co-sponsors.

Other Senators endorsing the bill include Republican Trent Lott (the former majority leader) and Democrats Frank Lautenberg and Richard Durbin (the majority whip).

Iranian intelligence official missing, may have defected

JERUSALEM — A former Iranian deputy defence minister whose reported disappearance in Turkey has sparked allegations of a Mossad and CIA-linked kidnapping, may have defected, Ha'aretz has learned.

Intelligence official Ali Reza Azkari, 63, served in the senior defence post under former defence minister Gen. Ali Samahani. Israeli media have said that for many years, Azkari was the most senior Iranian intelligence official in Lebanon, with responsibility for Iran's ties with Hezbollah.

Unnamed Arab diplomats have been quoted in Israeli media as charging that the Israeli Mossad and the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency kidnapped Azkari, who reportedly disappeared under mysterious circumstances from Istanbul, Turkey, a month ago.

Israel Channel 10 television said Sunday that Azkari was kidnapped on Feb. 7, after arriving in Istanbul from Damascus.

There has been no official Iranian statement on the reported affair.

According to one report, Azkari was to have stayed at a luxury hotel in the city, but disappeared before his planned arrival there. Another report said he had checked into the hotel and was staying there at the time of his disappearance. The second account said he left the hotel at one point and never returned, his baggage still in his room.

Iran reportedly sent a delegation of defence officials to Turkey last week to investigate the incident. It has also been reported that Iran has asked Interpol to open an investigation into the disappearance.

Israel Briefs

Israel plays down Saudi proposal

Israel's foreign minister played down the viability of a Saudi-sponsored peace proposal. In an interview, Tzipi Livni said she had been hopeful about the proposal for a comprehensive Israeli-Arab peace that was broached by Saudi Arabia in 2002, at the height of a Palestinian terrorist campaign. But she added that changes to the formula by the Arab League had cooled Israel's interest. "At first the Saudi initiative was a positive sign, but when the radicals in Beirut added things that contravene the two-state solution, then for us it became unacceptable in its current formula," Livni told the Palestinian newspaper Al-Ayyam. She appeared to be referring to the Arab League's insistence that Israel agree to a "right of return" for Palestinian refugees to land now in Israel.

Israelis convicted for aiding suicide bomber

The Tel Aviv District Court convicted three Israeli citizens of manslaughter for transporting a suicide bomber who struck outside Netanya's HaSharon Mall in July 2005, killing five people and wounding over 90. Shani Saif Azzam of Taibeh, Abd Abu Mukh of Baka al-Garbiyeh and Kfir Levi of Ramat Gan were also convicted of causing injury to those wounded in the attack. In the past, defendants in similar cases have been convicted of lesser violations such as accessory to murder or causing death by negligence. The prosecution said in the indictment that each of the three defendants suspected at a certain point that the passenger intended to carry out a bombing, but failed to act to prevent it.

Economy bounces back

Israel's economy has more than recovered from the setbacks of the Lebanon war, new data revealed. The Central Bureau of Statistics announced last week that between November and January, Israeli exports increased by 22 per cent, industrial output by 7.9 per cent and consumer spending between 3.2 per cent and 10.5 per cent. The indicators show a dramatic reversal of the decline registered in the third quarter of 2006, when Israel waged a 34-day war against Hezbollah. Among the sectors hardest hit by that conflict was tourism, but the bureau reported a 26.8 per cent rise in hotel occupancy by foreigners over the past two months.

Happy Passover cooking

Even though our tulips are several weeks away from poking their heads through the frosty ground, most of us are starting to think about spring and the festival of Passover.

As we don our winter coats, we plan the time-honoured rituals of Passover, including a thorough house cleaning, and we think about turning our homes upside down to ensure we've removed every trace of chametz.

We also think about putting away our every-day utensils, and taking out special Passover pots, pans, dishes and linens.

As kosher for Passover food items appear on the grocery shelves, we plan our seder, the ritual meal in which we retell the story of the journey to freedom and the birth of the Jewish nation.

We can imagine the seder table set with the requisite symbolic foods – wine, matzah, green vegetables, bitter herbs, charoset, salt water, a roasted bone and a cooked egg.

Before we even begin to prepare food for the seder, some cooks can almost taste the favourite menu items that appear on their seder table each Pesach.

Every year in our food pages, The CJN tries to help those who want to add something new to their Passover repertoire or want to find a recipe for old-time family favourites.

We also try to include some tips, such as how to convert year-round ingredients to their Passover counterparts, and what to feed fussy eaters during the days following the two seders.

Whether you're making a seder for the first time, or bringing a dish to your family or friends' seder, we're sure something from our pages will grab you.

The ingredients in all our recipes are acceptable for Passover use, and can be purchased kosher for Passover in most large Jewish communities.

From all of us at The CJN, enjoy your Passover meals, and we wish you a chag kasher v'samayach. -C.B.

Easy fowl recipes guaranteed to please

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

Fowl is a always a favourite during the holidays, not the least because it's so versatile and popular. It's been my experience that most Passover hosts and cooks make two different kinds of meat for the seder, one beef (either a brisket or tsimmes) and then one chicken or turkey. The following recipes are some new suggestions for the holidays, full of bold flavours, easy on the cook, and with a wow factor guaranteed to please guests and family alike.

SLOW ROASTED CHICKEN WITH SAGE, LIME AND GARLIC

My aunt, Shirley Coleman, first introduced me to this wonderful way of roasting chicken. I especially like it because the oven temperature is already the perfect heat for rewarming dishes that I have made ahead. It's virtually foolproof, with the meat falling off the bones with tenderness at the end of three hours. I like to roast two chickens at once (the recipe doubles easily) when I'm having guests or just because I want the leftovers for another dish the next day.

1 whole chicken
1 large head garlic
1 lime, cut in half
3 sprigs fresh sage
2 tbsp. olive oil
1½ tbsp. dried (not ground) sage
½ tsp. kosher salt
¼ tsp. each paprika and pepper
½ cup fresh lime juice
½ cup chicken stock

Place chicken on rack in small roasting pan. Separate head of garlic into cloves; peel each clove. Place half of cloves, lime halves and sage sprigs into cavity of chicken. Truss chicken if desired.

In small bowl, stir together oil and sage. Brush all over surface of chicken. Sprinkle with salt, paprika and pepper. Pour lime juice and chicken stock over chicken.

Roast in centre of preheated 250 oven for 3 hours, basting every 30 minutes, until juices run clear when chicken is pierced and meat thermometer inserted in thigh registers 185. Remove chicken to cutting board; tent with foil for 10 minutes. Carve into pieces; transfer to platter and pour pan juices over to serve. (Chicken can be made up to 24 hours ahead. Cut into pieces and reheat at 250 in its own juices). Makes 4 servings.

ROASTED CORNISH HENS WITH TANGERINE HONEY GLAZE

Cornish hens are so elegant they're a welcome addition to any Passover seder. And halving them ensures a tidy and perfect portion for each guest. For a special presentation, lay each half on a heaping cupful of already cooked matzah stuffing before roasting. Then simply use a spatula to transfer stuffing and bird to each plate before adding or serving your side dishes.

Glaze:
2 cups fresh tangerine juice
⅓ cup honey
¼ cup soy sauce
2 tbsp. finely grated tangerine or orange rind
¼ tsp. hot pepper flakes

Hens:
1 cup fresh tangerine juice
½ cup chopped fresh coriander
2 tbsp. chopped fresh thyme
3 tbsp. minced fresh ginger root
3 tbsp. rice vinegar
2 tbsp. finely grated tangerine or orange rind
4 Cornish hens (each about 1¼ lb.)

For Glaze: In saucepan, boil together juice, honey and soy sauce for about 20 minutes or until reduced to ¾ cup. Stir in rind and hot pepper flakes. (Glaze can be made up to 2 days ahead. If glaze becomes too thick to brush on hens, stir in 2 tbsp. more tangerine juice).

In very large bowl or roasting pan, whisk together juice, coriander, thyme, ginger root, vinegar and rind. Cut wing tips from hens. Cut through backbones and then breast bones to divide hens in half; trim excess fat and skin. Add chicken to marinade, turning to coat all over. Cover with plastic wrap; refrigerate for at least 8 hours or for up to 24 hours.

Remove hens from marinade; discard marinade. Lay hens, skin side up on baking sheet or shallow roasting pan. Brush glaze over top. Roast in centre of preheated 375 oven for 40 to 45 minutes, brushing with glaze three times, or until hens are browned and juices run clear when hens are pierced with a fork. Broil for 2 to 3 minutes or until browned all over. Arrange on warmed platter to serve. Serve pan juices separately. Makes 8 servings.

ROASTED TURKEY BREAST WITH FENNEL AND ORANGE STUFFING

Fennel, once cooked, becomes a mild and luxurious vegetable, lacking the anise bite it has when raw. The added fennel seed reintroduces this unique flavour back into the stuffing, but feel free to omit it if you like. Remember that the breast will continue to cook for 5 to 10 minutes after you remove it from the oven so be sure not to overcook it.

4 lb. boneless turkey breast, skin on
1 tsp. kosher salt
½ tsp. pepper

Stuffing:
¼ cup olive oil
1 onion, chopped
3 cloves garlic, minced
2 tsp. grated orange rind
1 tsp. fennel seeds, crushed
½ tsp. kosher salt
¼ tsp. pepper
2 tbsp. fresh orange juice
1 large fennel bulb, leaves, removed and cut into ¼-inch pieces (about 2 cups)
½ cup chopped sweet red pepper

Sauce:
1½ tbsp. potato starch
½ cup kosher for Passover white wine
½ cup orange juice

Heat half of oil in large skillet set over medium heat. Add onions and garlic; cook, stirring, for 3 minutes or until softened Stir in orange rind, crushed fennel seeds, salt and pepper for 1 minute. Stir in fennel and orange juice; cook, stirring, for 15 minutes or until very soft. Stir in red pepper; cook for 3 minutes.

Butterfly turkey breast by slicing almost in half horizontally; open up like book. Sprinkle with half of salt and pepper. Cover with waxed paper; pound gently to thin. Spread evenly with fennel mixture. Starting at narrow skinless end, roll up. Tie at 2-inch intervals with kitchen string. Sprinkle with remaining salt and pepper. Drizzle remaining oil over.

Roast in centre of preheated 400 oven for 55 to 60 minutes or until juices run clear and meat thermometer registers 160. Transfer from roasting pan to platter; tent with foil for 10 minutes.

Meanwhile, place roasting pan over medium-high heat. Skim fat from juices in pan. Sprinkle potato starch over; whisk until fully dissolved. Pour in white wine and orange juice. Bring to boil, whisking constantly. Reduce heat, and cook, whisking for 3 to 5 minutes or until thickened.

Slice turkey; serve with sauce. Makes 8 servings.

Passover Food Ideas

JCFS cookbook has something for everyone

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

The Jewish Child and Family Service (JCFS) in Winnipeg has produced a cookbook titled A 21st Century Passover: Recipes from the Friends of Jewish Child and Family Service.

Rita Margolis, president of the JCFS board, and the JCFS cookbook committee brought together various good cooks in Winnipeg's Jewish community to come up with the book's array of unique recipes. Some of the recipes featured are from local celebrities, including Barb and Pam Reisse and Gail Asper.

For charoset alone, the book provides a half-dozen different ways to mix up this traditional favourite.

"Variety was definitely a main key in putting together this cookbook," says Merrill Shwaid, public relations co-ordinator of JCFS. "Our aim was to meet the needs of the whole community at large, including Ashkenazi and Sephardi alike, people of all ages, those who are health-food connoisseurs, and those who have a taste for traditionalism. We wanted to cover the whole community gamut."

[Rebeca Kuropatwa photo]

The cookbook was launched in March 2006 at the Asper Jewish Community Campus' Berney Theatre. The launch was hosted by Winnipeg-born David Gale, who received a Gemini Award as host of the TV show Loving Spoonfuls.

Recipes featured in A 21st Century Passover range from soups and starters, to side dishes, meat and poultry, fish, eggs, vegetarian and desserts.

Each of the book's contributers was asked to include an anecdote about the person who originally came up with the recipe they chose. Some of these anecdotes are sentimental, and others are funny.

Debbi Szternfeld Lipkin has a recipe for former TV game-show host Monty Hall's Sweet and Sour Herring, and she notes that Hall says Winnipeg philanthropist Bert Settler gave him the recipe. When Hall cooked up the recipe in Los Angeles, his guest, actor Alan Alda, loved it so much he ate a jarful.

Hilda Szternfeld Smith's Passover Roast Primavera recipe is included in the cookbook. She writes, "My parents met in Italy after the Second World War… I created this recipe, and it is dedicated to the memory of my late parents."

Caren Davis shares the recipe for "Natalie's Gefilte Fish Loaf," which she got from a good friend of her mother's. "It tastes most like my mother's fabulous fish without all the boiling and baking and 'patzka-jing,'" Davis notes.

Sandy Hyman's recipe for Passover Nuts is included. She cautions that they are "addictive and may cause non-stop tasting."

The book has a Passover calendar, lasting until 2020; a "how to" on setting the seder table; a detailed illustration of the seder plate; and an explanatory list of several modern Passover customs.

Shwaid says the recipe book would make a great Passover gift, especially when you are going to someone's home for a seder but are not sure what to bring.

This cookbook is "a clear, easy to follow, enjoyable way for singles, as well as new brides and grooms to carry on Jewish traditions," she says. "To eliminate pricey costs, we wanted to keep it simple – all in back and white, and an easy read." In its first year, 1,000 copies of the cookbook were sold in a two-week span.

To get a copy of the cookbook, contact Winnipeg's Jewish Child and Family Service office at 204-477-7430, fax 204-477-7450, or e-mail jcfs@aspercampus.mb.ca.

QUINOA PILAF

Ethel Soronow

1 cup quinoa
2 cups chicken broth, vegetable broth, or water with 2 tsp. chicken base
3 stalks celery, minced
1 red onion, diced
1 cup chopped mushrooms
½ cup diced bell peppers, any colour salt and pepper
herbs of choice (i.e., dill, basil, parsley, etc), add after cooking

Sauté the onions till translucent. Add the other vegetables. Soak the quinoa for 5 minutes in a bowl, drain and rinse. Place quinoa and vegetables into the broth, add salt and pepper, and bring to a boil. Simmer on medium-low heat for 15-20 minutes until tender. Drain any remaining cooking liquid and place back on burner to make sure the pilaf is dry.

Notes

Quinoa, originally from Central America, is a seed, not a grain, and can be used in recipes that call for couscous, orzo, etc.

PAN-FRIED GEFILTE FISH

Rita Margolis

2 lb. pickerel fillets
1 tbsp. salt
1 large onion, diced
1 tbsp. sugar
2 large carrots, diced
½ tsp. pepper
4 eggs
½ cup cold water
2 tbsp. matzah meal

Sauté onions and carrots in a little oil until softened. Cool. Grind fish, onions and carrots into a mixing bowl. Add rest of the ingredients and mix well with electric mixer. With wet hands, shape fish mixture into oval patties and fry on each side until browned. Place in a casserole. Cover tightly with foil in a 350 oven for 30 minutes. Chill.

'The secret' to a happier life

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

Giving people tools they can use to make their lives happier is really what life coaching is all about. So whenever I come across a powerful tool to add to the magical tool chest of ideas, I am very excited to share it with you.

I first came across "the secret" when a friend sent me the film of the same name, and I watched and listened with amazement. Then the buzz began. There was a book and an audiotape of the same name, too, not to mention Rhonda Byrne, the book's author, appearing on the Oprah Winfrey Show. Byrne's appearance evidently elicited millions of hits on the Oprah website. I was intrigued. How could this help my clients, readers, friends and relatives? So I began to research it.

I discovered the book contains some powerful information that can definitely help people live more joyful lives. But, of course, there was the skeptic in me. I knew that most people would question the book's message and analyze it, and I wanted to be sure the book had value before endorsing it and the principles within it.

What first impressed me was that the author traced the secret back through history to Plato, Shakespeare, Newton, Hugo, Beethoven, Lincoln, Edison and Einstein. So what did they all have in common? Well, according to one of the book's co-authors (there are 24 in total), Lisa Nichols, the secret is based on the law of attraction. She says, "You can see the law of attraction everywhere. You draw everything to yourself: the people, the job, the circumstances, the health, the wealth, the debt, the joy, the car that you drive, the community that you're in. And you've drawn them all to you, like a magnet.

"What you think about, you bring about. Your whole life is a manifestation of the thoughts that go on in your head."

This law of attraction says that "like attracts like," so every time you think a thought, you are also attracting like thoughts to you. Byrne goes on to say, "Thoughts are magnetic, and thoughts have a frequency. As you think thoughts, they are sent out into the universe, and they magnetically attract all like things that are on the same frequency. Everything sent out returns to the source – you. Your current thoughts are creating your future life. What you think about the most or focus on the most will appear as your life. Your thoughts become things."

So part of the book's message involves feeling good, so that good thoughts can follow. According to author Marci Shimoff, "If you're feeling good, then you're creating a future that's on track with your desires. If you're feeling bad, you're creating a future that's off track with your desires. As you go about your day, the law of attraction is working in every second. Everything we think and feel is creating our future. If you're worried or in fear, then you're bringing more of that into your life throughout out he day."

Alternatively, when you're feeling good, you must be thinking good thoughts, which according to The Secret, will attract back to you more good thoughts that will continue to make you feel good. How many times have you changed your mood from feeling down to feeling uplifted by just putting on a piece of beautiful music or singing your heart out? Or sometimes you can change your thinking by just thinking of something beautiful like your baby or someone you love. Make a list of things that will change your feelings instantly.

Another tool for living a happier life is to live in your purpose, because when you do, you will feel happier emotions and thoughts, such as excitement, joy, gratitude and love. Also, the feeling of love and putting love in your heart will always put you into a happier place.

Ask yourself what do you really want. Write it out in the present tense and then imagine and visualize that what you desire is already here. Then believe you can actually have it and that it's already yours. By doing so, you are putting yourself into a sphere that can make your wishes turn into a reality.

Toronto opera director reigns on Bravo

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Tom Diamond isn't accustomed to his newfound TV fame, but he's getting there.

As one of the judges on the wildly popular Bravo TV series Bathroom Divas: So You Want To Be An Opera Star, the Toronto-based opera director has become an attraction in his adopted hometown and across the country.

"I was shopping in St. Lawrence market for fish the other day and this woman came up to me and said, 'Hey! You're that guy from the opera show. I hated opera before, but now I love it,'" Diamond recounts with a grin.

OK, so maybe he's not quite a household name yet.

Though he's enjoying his time in the spotlight, Diamond never forgets his Jewish roots.

"It informs everything I do. I really aspire to be a good Jew in the best sense of the word," he said. "I want to be a mensch. I think that having menschlichkeit in your life is a hugely important concern. I want to make the world a better place and help people if I can."

Last summer, just before production started on season two of Bathroom Divas, his father passed away. The emotional impact almost dissuaded him from rejoining the show's cast.

But Diamond leaned on his heritage to come through that ordeal.

"I say Kaddish for my father twice daily and it's given me a lot of hope and strength. And that's been a very important part of my existence," he explained.

Now that he's in his second go-around on the show as its exuberant drama coach, his increased mainstream celebrity is a welcome change.

"The first season was fantastic fun," he said. "But I thought no one would watch it. Then the ratings came in. It was the highest-rated show ever on the Bravo network."

He's pleased the series has helped raise the profile of opera in the public eye.

While the show offers up its share of intrigue and melodrama, it also has a realness to it that endears viewers, Diamond said.

According to him, what you see on screen is genuine.

"One of the things I advocate as an acting teacher is to excavate your authentic self," he said. "If you can't do that as an artist, then don't bother. So I thought to myself, 'Walk the walk, baby. If you're gonna do this, be you.'"

Born in Winnipeg, "the entertainment capital of Manitoba, by default" quipped Diamond, he caught the theatre bug at 10 and was encouraged by his parents to follow his passion.

"I never thought I wanted to be an opera director back then," he said. "I didn't even know what opera was outside of my dad listening to it on the radio."

His parents also pushed him to learn the piano, which he credits as the catalyst for his eventual metamorphosis into an opera director.

"It was a form of self expression in a world where I couldn't always express myself," he said. "Playing the romantic composers like Chopin and Brahms... even playing Bach was great. I could say something through it."

The jovial Diamond eventually parlayed his love of acting and his early musical training into an accomplished, directorial career, spanning more than 25 years in the Canadian opera and theatre scene.

His credits include work with the Canadian Opera Company, the off-broadway hit Squonk and his job as director-in-residence with Toronto's New Opera Works, a production house dedicated to staging original Canadian operas.

If you haven't seen Bathroom Divas, it's well worth a look. Think American Idol, only with less pomp and circumstance, more talent (way more) and that most Canadian of elements, humility.

The show, which premiered Feb.10, runs for six episodes, with a diva being crowned on the season's final telecast on March 17.

The winner will sing with the Vancouver Symphony Orchestra.

"Other shows are really just talent competitions," Diamond said. "[Bathroom Divas] is about transformation, which is the key word you keep hearing in the series. It shows us putting our hands on people and working with them so that the general public understands what it takes to become an opera-singer."

Diamond isn't sure if a third season of Bathroom Divas is in the works or not, but said he's ready for that challenge if it comes along and won't change his style, no matter what project he works on.

"I'm an in-your-face kind of guy and not everybody goes for that," he said. "For the longest time, everyone thought opera directors had to be these stoic figures who ponder and dole out their platitudes of wisdom. But that's never been my style. That's not me."

Bathroom Divas airs on the Bravo network Saturdays at 9 p.m. with repeats Tuesdays at 8 p.m.

HOWARD WISEMAN PLAY EXPLORES JEWISH-NATIVE RELATIONSHIP

Ana Lazavsky at Israelartsource.com

Howard Wiseman, playwright and screenwriting teacher at York University, has written The Year of the Flood, a play set against the backdrop of the Winnipeg flood of 1950, when events test the friendship between Alec Greywolf, a native leader and trapper, and Herb Sampson, a Russian Jewish furrier.

The play premièred as a workshop production by the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre in March 2003.

An impressive cast (Gary Farmer, Jerry Franken, Brittany Kay, Billy Merasty, Aron Tager, Jacob Tierney, Theresa Tova) has been assembled for a staged reading at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, Al Green Theatre, 750 Spadina Ave. (at Bloor) on Sunday, March 11, 4 p.m. Admission at the door is $8 ($5 for students). 416-924-6211, ext. 606

While we're on the subject of plays with Jewish content, playwrights should take note that the submission deadline is May 31 for this year's Jewish playwriting competition, sponsored by the Miles Nadal JCC.

Plays should have a Jewish focus and take one to two hours of stage time. The playwright must be Canadian or have a strong Canadian connection, and use a pseudonym on the manuscript. For full submission guidelines, please contact Esther Arbeid, film and theatre co-ordinator, Miles Nadal JCC, at esthera@mnjcc.org.

Previous contest winners have been published and have hit the commercial stages: Einstein's Gift by Vern Thiessen, Sara's Cave by Don Molnar and Yahrzeit by Alex Poch Goldin. A Daughter Lost by Tara Goldstein, which won in 2005, is scheduled for a Between Stages reading on Sunday, April 15, 2 p.m.

Oscar-winning falafel-stand musical holds out hope for peace

By TOM TUGEND
JTA

LOS ANGELES — The arc of West Bank Story, from student project to Oscar winner, is the kind of fairy tale that Hollywood used to crank out in more innocent days.

But turning fantasy into reality, Ari Sandel's 21-minute movie – taglined "A little singing, a little dancing, a lot of hummus" – won the Academy Award for short film-live action on Feb. 25.

The title is a riff on Leonard Bernstein's West Side Story. In this case, though, the confrontation is between competing West Bank falafel stands, the Israeli Kosher King and the Palestinian Hummus Hut.

Their weapons are falafel and hummus folded into a pita, the soul food loved by all Middle East factions.

Into this delectable mix stir David, a handsome Israeli soldier, and the beautiful Fatima, who works at the Hummus Hut, and you can probably figure out the basic plot line.

Ari Sandel holds his Oscar award

Amid catchy tunes, dancing and a mugging camel, David and Fatima fall in love. After both eating establishments are set on fire, the lovers persuade the rival owners to join hands and hummus to feed their hungry customers.

Viewers are free to draw hopeful analogies to current Middle East problems.

Sandel, 32, tall and fast talking, says he's ready for his closeup.

His father is Israeli, his mother a Los Angeles native, and in 2004 Sandel was mulling over a subject for a less-than-30 minute film, a thesis requirement at the University of Southern California's School of Cinematic Arts.

Sandel knew that he wanted to say something about politics and the Middle East, two of his longtime passions. His first idea had to do with checkpoints and suicide bombers, but he was looking for something funnier and more hopeful.

What do Israelis and Palestinians have in common, he asked himself and co-writer Kim Ray, and the answer was a love of food.

"After that, everything fell in place," he said.

All Sandel needed was a cast, a songwriter, a choreographer, a set, costumes, a budget – and lots of hummus.

He hit up friends and family for a total of $74,000, auditioned fellow students for the parts and hustled movie studios and merchants for freebies.

"I got free set props from Warner Brothers, free post-production services from someone else, and one acquaintance printed up free business cards for me," Sandel recalls.

On a commercial movie ranch outside Los Angeles, Sandel found the set for a small Arab town, including a minaret, and he wrapped up the film in 14 days.

"I thought we had done a pretty good job and now my ambition was to screen the film in three venues — Sundance, Jerusalem and Dubai," he said.

West Bank premiered at the Sundance Film Festival in 2005 and received a warm response. Next came a screening in Jerusalem. With two-thirds of his goal fulfilled, Sandel wrote an impassioned letter to the Dubai Film Festival and, to his amazement, the film was accepted in the "Bridging Cultures" category.

"The Dubai festival is sort of a Middle Eastern Sundance, only you get much more of a VIP treatment," Sandel said.

The United Arab Emirates capital is a rapidly modernizing city, but officially no Jews live there and no one had ever shown a movie depicting an Israeli soldier in a positive light.

So when West Bank screened in Dubai's biggest venue before 1,000 Arab dignitaries and movie producers, Sandel was understandably nervous.

The post-film question-and-answer session started badly. One Arab rose to protest that the film failed to portray the suffering of the Palestinian people, and half the audience applauded. Another man was unhappy with the lack of scenes depicting Israeli brutality.

Finally a woman stood up, identified herself as a refugee from Gaza, said she loved the movie and asked how she could get a copy for her friends and relatives.

With such a Palestinian imprimatur on the record, the audience turned friendly and the evening was deemed a success.

In its showings at 112 film festivals, West Bank Story has occasionally been criticized as being "too American" or "too simplistic." But it has also garnered 25 awards, including an audience choice prize in Beijing. Requests for DVDs of the movie have come from Qatar, Egypt and other Muslim countries.

Sandel describes the short film genre as "the no-man's land of filmmaking," with no studio backing and few monetary rewards – he still hasn't made back his $74,000 investment.

But it can be a great calling card, especially with an Oscar attached.

Sandel says he is "obsessed" with the politics of the Middle East, visits Israel every year and seems open to all views.

He is also active in both the American Israel Public Affairs Committee and Peace Now, two groups usually on opposite sides.

"My intention was to make a movie that Israelis and Jews would watch and find themselves liking the Arab characters, and that Arabs would watch and like the Israeli characters," he said backstage at the Oscars ceremony.

"Is the film is going to change the world or do anything else? Probably not. But, you know, if you can change just a few minds… I get e-mails from all over the world, from Israelis and Arabs, talking about how much the movie meant to them. That's hopeful because otherwise there is such a sea of negativity out there."

For Oscar night, Sandel rented a tuxedo and escorted his mother, Kathy, down the red carpet.

His cousins in Israel threw a party, and friends and relatives watched the show on television at his father's house in Malibu. The evening's refreshments, of course, were falafel and hummus.

Punk-klezmer player inspired by alt.country

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Geoff Berner doesn't play jazz, he doesn't sing in Yiddish and he earned his chops in a punk band. So how is this Vancouverite fast becoming one of klezmer's rising stars?

Since 2003, when Berner released the critically acclaimed Whisky Rabbi, indie music and klezmer fans alike have taken to this curious accordion player. His passionate tunes are as raw as the Clash's, as minimal as Billy Bragg's, and as catchy as anything David Buchbinder's created.

It's a sound that's paying off. He's sold more than 8,000 records worldwide and is quickly developing a following among Jews and non-Jews alike.

But his steady rise among klezmer's ranks hasn't been without a few hiccups. Some purists aren't crazy about Berner's punk-klezmer blend. "People have said, if you're not singing in Yiddish, how can you call this klezmer? My answer to that is that Shane McGowan doesn't sing in Irish Gaelic and nobody challenges what he's doing isn't valid Irish music, although I'm sure there was some Irish traditionalists who hated what the Pogues were doing."

Fortunately, Berner's idols – including Matt Bern of Brave New World to name one – are endorsing the father of three. "The experts really dug what I was doing," he says.

Berner's new album The Wedding Dance of the Widow Bride is part two in what the artist calls his "klezmer journey." The first, Whisky Rabbi, was an album about drinking, the second is about marriage and the third, he says, will be about children.

"These are the the things in life that matter to me. Wine, women and song," he says.

Like his first disc, the new one is filled with infectious, minimalist tracks, filled out by accordion, violin and drums. On it he sings a lot about marriage – typical for a klezmer player – but his take on relationships might not go over well at your traditional simchah.

On Weep, Bride, Weep, he sings, "Your girlhood is over and your womenhood lies stretched out before you like a dull grey matronly corpse on the coroner's slab."

"That's actually from a Jewish wedding ritual," he says. "During this song, a bride sits on a chair and the band plays while the toastmaster sings a song to make the bride cry. The lyrics tend to be about how this girl's fun time is over and she has to leave her family behind. So I'm just writing a version of that, that would resonate with people."

Other songs, such as Widow Bride, which says marriage is better without a husband in the picture, pokes fun at wedded bliss. Berner himself isn't married, but, he says, he lives with a "very nice lady."

"I tend to take a Marxist view of marriage, in that Marx said marriage is state-sponsored prostitution," he says half joking. "There are good sides and bad sides to that of course."

But if Berner's proved anything, it's that he doesn't need to be authentic to do what he does. He's never sung in Yiddish, despite playing a genre whose legacy is built on the language. Berner says while he finds Yiddish interesting, he has no interest in incorporating it into his own work.

"It's a dead language," he says. "I suspect that a lot of the appeal of bands who sing in Yiddish is that it exoticizes the music and people like the fact that they have no idea what the singer is saying."

As simple as it sounds, another reason he stays away from using the language is that he lives in Canada, not Poland. "When [klezmer] was a vital contemporary force, it was sung in the vernacular, and the vernacular happened to be Yiddish. To hear it now isn't really to hear it the way people who grew up in the kitchen learning Yiddish from their mother did."

In fact, Berner associates more with the punk rockers who've turned to country music, than his fellow, jazz-trained cohorts. He says his inspiration to fuse rock and klezmer was inspired by current alt.country mainstays Corb Lund and Neko Case.

"These were mainly punks who were playing country that was way more real than what was on country radio. The music of Corb Lund, Neko Case and Carolyn Mark is actually country. It doesn't have pitch shifters on it, they're not playing to a click track. These kids are playing country because it's part of the heritage."

Unlike Lund and Case though, who've seen a lot of success, Berner has yet to fully conquer the klezmer punk genre. To start, he might want to consider taking at least one page out of the traditional klezmer book: playing weddings. He's actually been asked to play a few, including one ceremony.

Who in their right mind would want Berner singing Weep, Bride, Weep at their wedding? "They're just like the rest of my fans," he says. "Weird, bookish, fun people who like to drink. The age range is very wide in that."

Jews celebrate handful of victories at Oscars

By TOM TUGEND
JTA

LOS ANGELES — After a slow start in the initial Oscar nominations, Hollywood's Jews reaffirmed the tribe's historic resilience with a credible finish at the Academy Awards.

Host Ellen DeGeneres set the stage in the Feb. 25 broadcast by noting the diversity of this year's nominees, concluding that without "blacks, Jews and gays, there would be no Oscar."

Alan Arkin beat out the likes of Eddie Murphy and Mark Wahlberg to win the best supporting actor award for his role as the coke-snorting, womanizing grandfather in Little Miss Sunshine.

The 72-year-old actor, director, author and musician waited a long time for the honour. He was nominated for his 1966 screen debut, The Russians Are Coming, the Russians Are Coming, and again in 1968 for his role in The Heart is a Lonely Hunter, but lost both times.

An Inconvenient Truth, Al Gore's film on the threat of global warming, captured the documentary feature Oscar. Sharing the stage and the plaudits with the former U.S. vice-president were the film's Jewish director Davis Guggenheim and producer Laurie David, wife of TV personality and writer Larry David.

Alan Arkin

Perhaps the most surprised winner of the evening was Ari Sandel, whose West Bank Story took the Academy Award for best live action short film.

Created as a student project at the University of Southern California, the 21-minute musical comedy depicts a rivalry between fictitious Jewish and Arab owners of adjacent falafel stands in the West Bank.

Their conflict is resolved with singing, dancing and a lot of hummus when an Israeli soldier falls in love with a Palestinian girl. In his acceptance speech, Sandel, 32, pointed to the more serious aspect of his little allegory.

"This film is about hope and peace between Israelis and Palestinians," said the director, whose father is Israeli. "So many other people support this notion, so perhaps hope is not hopeless."

Israeli composer Yuval Ron wrote the songs and score for West Bank Story.

British comedian Sacha Baron Cohen was present, but his adapted screenplay for Borat was trumped by the script for The Departed, which also snagged the Oscar for best picture.

The Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences presented its Humanitarian Award to Sherry Lansing, the former head of Paramount Studios who has long been active in civic and Jewish charities.

Polish embassy, theatre spar over play about anti-Semitism

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — A planned production by the Jewish Theater of New York on anti-Semitism in Lodz has generated an angry exchange of letters with the Polish government.

Piotr Erenfeicht, press secretary for the Polish Embassy in Washington, complained about the portrayal of his country in online publicity materials for Last Jew in Europe, a tragicomedy about the resurgence of anti-Semitism in Lodz.

In a letter to Liz Lauren, the theatre's press contact, Erenfeicht objected to photographs of anti-Jewish graffiti scrawled on walls around the city. A press release refers to Lodz as "an anti-Semite's paradise."

"The images in the press release focus on anti-Semitism not of specific people blemished by a particular vice of character or judgment, but rather on a whole nation," Erenfeicht wrote in a letter that the theatre released to the media.

"This creates a broad, unfair and misleading perception of a given nation, in this case the Polish nation."

Tuvia Tenenbom, the theatre's artistic director, replied with an angry letter, calling the Polish complaint "ridiculous" and asserting that American Jews are a "mature group" who "have their own brains and are surely mentally capable to draw conclusions on their own."

Tenenbom also took issue with Erenfeicht's example of the Lodz Four Cultures Festival as demonstrating the city's kindness toward the Jewish people.

"Well, to inform you, I've been there," Tenenbom wrote. "I was amazed by how this festival so carefully chooses Jewish shows that depict Jews as a nebbish bunch of idiots."

The exchange comes after years in which Poland has worked to change its image as a haven of anti-Semitism, an effort set back by the publication earlier this month of a tract by a Polish member of the European Parliament suggesting that Jews are unethical.

Polish President Lech Kaczynski reportedly said the booklet "worried me seriously," and the European Parliament is considering sanctions against the author, Maciej Giertych.

The theatre controversy, which found its way into the pages of a New York tabloid, likely will draw even more attention to the production, which tells the story of a young Polish Jew afraid of losing his Christian fiancée if his religion is revealed.

The play was warmly received when performed in Germany during the 2006 soccer World Cup. The play was set to open in New York on March 4.

Erenfeicht told JTA his purpose was not to attack the play but to express concern about an unfair portrayal of his country.

"It just kind of showed just one side to a whole country and a whole group of people," Erenfeicht said. "I was just concerned that a negative view would be brought out of that."

'A radical turning point in Jewish history'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For historian Michael Stanislawski, the 1995 assassination of Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin brought to mind a remarkably similar incident that occurred in the Austro-Hungarian Empire more than a century earlier.

On Sept. 6, 1848, an assassin murdered the 41-year-old Reform rabbi of Lemberg, Abraham Kohn. Just as Rabin was killed by an Orthodox Jew, so Kohn was cut down by a conservative religious Jew.

To Stanislawski, a professor of Jewish history at Columbia University, the parallels were too striking to ignore.

Rabbi Kohn's murder, which seems to have have escaped the notice of many historians, is the subject of Stanislawski's A Murder in Lemberg: Politics, Religion, and Violence in Modern Jewish History (Princeton University Press).

"This was a story that needed to be told," he writes, explaining that its importance lies in the fact that it sheds new light on the fissures that divided the Jewish community and on the nature of religious diversity in 19th century Europe.

But Stanislawski, a Canadian, could not have written this slim, fascinating book without having immersed himself in the municipal archives of Lviv, previously known as Lemberg.

"This is the first book in any language devoted to this murder and its investigation, although it builds on a smaller number of earlier analyses in Polish, German, Hebrew, Yiddish and English," he writes. "These earlier studies, however, got crucial facts in this case wrong."

Rabbi Kohn, the central figure, was born in Bohemia. A fine student who studied philosophy and Talmud, he was ordained in 1832 and was a fully observant traditional Jew at the outset of his career as a rabbi.

But as time went on, he drew away from Orthodoxy, a process Stanislawski describes in some detail.

When Rabbi Kohn took up his new position in Lemberg, it was the most important centre of "Jewish modernism" in Galicia, where "modernist" (i.e., non-Orthodox) synagogues had been established.

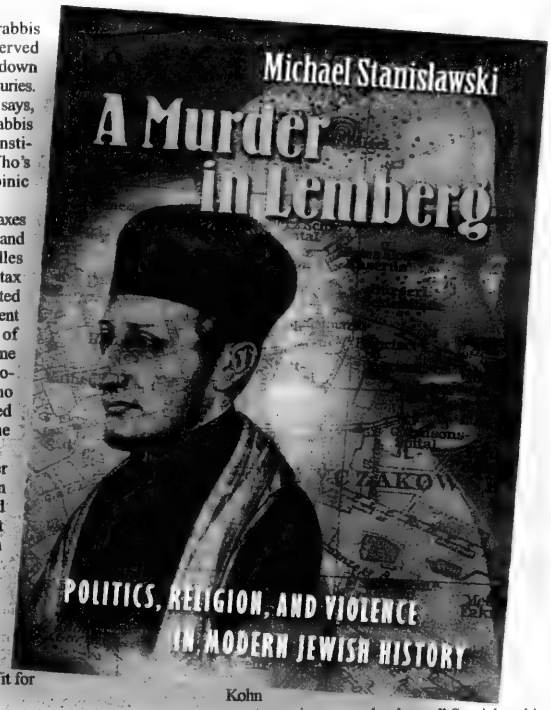
The German-style "temple" in Lemberg was consecrated in September 1846, seven years after the death of Rabbi Jacob Orenstein, a renowned figure in Orthodox Judaism.

The temple was the brainchild of progressive members of the Jewish business elite, led by Jacob Rappoport, a physician, and Emanuel Blumenfeld, a lawyer.

Orthodox Jews were none too pleased by these stirrings, nor were they happy when Rabbi Kohn succeeded Rabbi Orenstein as Lemberg's district rabbi.

To the rabbinic and lay leaders of Orthodoxy, Rabbi Kohn was a problem on two counts.

First, his appointment, ratified by the state, was perceived as an insult to the memory of the Orthodox rabbis who had served Lemberg down through the centuries. As Stanislawki says, the Orthodox rabbis of Lemberg constituted a "Who's Who" of rabbinic giants.



Second, the taxes on kosher meat and Sabbath candles that Jewish "tax farmers" collected for the government were a source of enormous income to certain Orthodox Jews, who thus had a vested interest in the status quo.

No sooner had Rabbi Kohn been appointed than the richest Jews in Lemberg, all Orthodox, submitted a petition to the authorities denouncing him as an unlearned Jew unfit for the job.

They demanded that the district rabbi, in keeping with custom, should be elected rather than appointed.

Their petition having been rebuffed, they launched a vociferous campaign against Rabbi Kohn aimed at the hearts and minds of the Orthodox Jewish masses.

They claimed that he desecrated the Sabbath and ate non-kosher food; that the architectural model of the new temple was the local Catholic cathedral; and that he tore the curtain off the Holy Ark when he delivered his first sermon.

These were calumnies, says Stanislawski.

Eight months before his assassination, Rabbi Kohn was attacked by a gang of Orthodox Jews and beaten up. The police were called in, but at Rabbi Kohn's request, no charges were laid.

Nevertheless, as he wrote in a letter to his brother in Vienna in August 1848, he feared for his life.

A day before his death, an Orthodox Jew named Abraham Ber Pilpel snuck into the Kohn kitchen and stealthily poured arsenic into a pot of soup on the stovetop.

Kohn and his family fell ill. Doctors saved the life of Rabbi Kohn's wife and four children, but Rabbi Kohn and his infant daughter succumbed on Sept. 7.

In an autopsy, the contents of Kohn's stomach and duodenum were examined and found to contain traces of poison. Under the Austrian Imperial Criminal Code, the poisoning was listed as an assassination.

Pilpel was charged with murder and given 20 years of hard labour, the maximum possible sentence. An appellate court reversed the decision.

"And so technically, the murder of Abraham Kohn must remain an unsolved case," Stanislawski concludes.

Twelve years after Rabbi Kohn's demise, a group of Orthodox Jewish youths in Amsterdam almost stoned to death the rabbi of a Reform shul. One of the leading modern Orthodox rabbis of the day, Esriel Hildesheimer, condemned the assault as a chillul HaShem.

"But to the best of our knowledge, there was… no comparable Orthodox condemnation of the murder of Rabbi Abraham Kohn in Lemberg, or anywhere else," notes Stanislawski.

In his view, Rabbi Kohn's murder was "a radical turning point in Jewish history because for the first, but alas not the last, time since the 'wars of the Jews' under the Romans, do we encounter the murder of a Jewish leader by another Jew on the basis of political-cum-religious motivations."

He adds: "Indeed, far more broadly, the Kohn assassination reveals a fundamental aspect of modern Jewish history that has heretofore remained all but unstudied: the alliance in many times and places between Orthodox (and other forms of traditionalist Jewry) and conservative and even reactionary political forces and states."

Fastforwarding, Stanislawski cites two 20th century political assassinations that bear a resemblance to the Kohn case: the murder of Jacob De Haan – one of the leaders of the haredi Agudath Israel party – in 1924 in Jerusalem, and the assassination of Labor Zionist leader Haim Arlosoroff in 1930 in Tel Aviv.

Sixty four years later, Yigal Amir, an extreme right-wing Zionist and Orthodox Jew opposed to territorial compromise, shot Rabin, thus closing the circle originally drawn by Abraham Ber Pilpel in Lemberg in 1848.

Comedians fundraise to fight colorectal cancer

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

After losing his grandmother to colorectal cancer a year ago, Mark Lebovits made an important decision about his health.

Although only 24, Lebovits decided to go in for a colonoscopy, a screening test which, if done early on, may have saved his grandmother's life.

"With a colonoscopy, my grandmother's cancer would have been caught, and if it's caught early, it's very curable," said Lebovits.

"I got screened recently and actually had some polyps. They are benign, but they needed to be removed because they can turn into cancerous cells."

Lebovits is presently a volunteer with the Colorectal Cancer Association of Canada (CCAC), serving as the group's Young Adult Program Director.

He's trying to encourage his contemporaries to be informed about the disease, which is prevalent amongst Ashkenazi Jews and is 90 per cent preventable if caught early.

"I joined the CCAC to get the word out about screening as early as possible, especially when there is a family history," he said.

In March, the CCAC will be busy with education, awareness and advocacy initiatives as part of National Colorectal Cancer Awareness Month.

The CCAC's flagship fundraising event will be the third annual Crack-A-Smile Comedy Night, which takes place on Saturday, April 8, at the Toronto Centre for the Arts' George Weston Recital Hall.

Hosted by Patrick McKenna of the Red Green Show, the affair will showcase a cast of well-known comedians, including Craig Lauzon of the Royal Canadian Air Farce and Neil Crone from Little Mosque on the Prairie.

"It's a really fun event," Lebovits said.

Recently, the Ontario government launched the first province-wide screening program to provide early detection of colorectal cancer, the second deadliest form of cancer in Canada.

The program involves people who are 50 and over having increased access to a home screening kit called the fecal occult blood test, available at doctor's offices, clinics and community health centres.

"It's a step in the right direction," Levbovits said of the government program.

"But a colonoscopy is really crucial. I think people 40 and over should have it done. I had it done and it's really not difficult."

In addition to regular screening, ways to prevent colorectal cancer include ongoing exercise, a diet rich in fruits, vegetables and whole grains, as well as not smoking.

For more information about the CCAC and the Crack-A-Smile Comedy Night, visit www.ccac-accc.ca or contact Ticketmaster at 416-872-1111 or online at www.ticketmaster.ca.

Book chronicles life of Scarborough's NBA all-star

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Before they retired, Wayne Gretzky and Mario Lemieux were indisputably the two best hockey players of their generation.

Gretzky was beloved by the fans, more outgoing, a recognized ambassador for hockey. Lemieux, on the other hand, always seemed to labour in Gretzky's shadow, and for Canadian fans, Gretzky always got top marks for lacing up his skates to play for Canada whenever called upon. Lemieux, less so.

Something similar exists today when it comes to pro basketball. Canada has produced two players of exceptional talent and skill, both of whom are showcasing their talents on the NBA hardcourt. First there's Steve Nash, two-time MVP, the guy who many times answered the bell to play for Canada, beloved of fans and ever-present on TV commercials.

And then there's Jamaal Magloire – an all-star in his own right, but not quite so talented, with an image tainted by suggestions he's sometimes a dirty player and a guy who has rarely played for Canada on the international stage.

Magloire, a 6-11, 259-pound centre with the Portland Trail Blazers, is the subject of a new biography by Toronto lawyer and journalist David Goldstein.

As far as Goldstein is concerned, "This guy is a good Canadian. He's a great Canadian."

Even more, he's a fascinating character, the son of Trinidadian immigrants with his own rags to riches story.

Jamaal Magloire, A Biography, (iUniverse, Inc.) tells the story of Magloire's journey from the dingy court at Toronto's Eastern Commerce Collegiate Institute to a top flight NCAA basketball program at Kentucky, all the way to the big league as a 2000 first round draft pick (19th overall) of the then-Charlotte Hornets. Profits from sale of the book will be donated to Magloire's charity, the Youth Deserve a Chance to Dream.

Despite his success in cracking the elite world of NBA basketball, Magloire remains "a down to earth" guy. "He comes back after the season and still lives in Scarborough," Goldstein said. "He's very much a part of his community. I think he's a little withdrawn, quieter than Nash, but at the same time, he's definitely approachable and a nice guy."

Goldstein, who pens about a dozen player profiles each year for the Cincinnati Enquirer, first became intrigued by Magloire while watching the 2004 all-star game.

There was Magloire, an imposing centre dominating on the world stage, and "I felt I did not know about him," Goldstein said.

He had written for Share, a newspaper that serves the Caribbean community in Toronto, and he'd noticed Magloire's name coming up in connection with charity events and, of course, his basketball career.

But the rest of the population didn't know much about the star. "I didn't feel he was embraced as much as he should be," Goldstein said.

Writing with Magloire's co-operation, Goldstein describes how the Toronto high school star was recruited by famed coach Rick Pitino to play at the University of Kentucky, only to see Pitino leave after Magloire's freshman year to take a position with the Boston Celtics.

Luckily – and thanks to the bargain struck by Magloire when he agreed to play for Kentucky – his high school coach, Simeon Mars, was still with him at the NCAA school and helped him adjust to the NCAA grind.

Magloire and the Wildcats went on to win a national championship, and Magloire's contribution, particularly on defence, was significant.

But throughout his four-year college career, nothing was handed to the Canadian star.

He found he couldn't dominate at Kentucky the way he could back home. Instead, it took hard work, and the willingness to sacrifice his body and play an aggressive, physical style for him to succeed.

He remains Kentucky's all-time leader in career blocked shots with 268.

Goldstein's biography traces Magloire's ups and downs, provides lots of insight into the college and pro games, and addresses the controversial question of racism that once plagued the national team selection process. Goldstein suggests that may have been a factor in Magloire's reluctance to play for Canada.

While Magloire is still in mid-career – he's only 28 – one part of his legacy could well be the increased prominence he has given Canadian players.

"Jamaal really opened the door" to homegrown talent, and plenty of Canadian kids are playing all over the United States, Goldstein said.

As the NBA trade deadline came and went, Goldstein was watching to see if Magloire would move – back home.

The Toronto Raptors could use a big guy to play if centre Rasho Nesterovic gets hurt, Goldstein said.

"You'd love to see it happen," he added. "I think he'd be a great fit for Toronto."

Inside Back

It's all a confidence game

Sandie Benitah
20 Something

I remember seeing the 2005 movie Hitch and joking afterward with my girlfriends about how nice it would be if there really could be a "Dr. Love" type of guy to explain what women want to all the men in our lives who have driven us crazy over the years.

Recently, I was shocked to find out that an old friend of mine from elementary school was running a successful business as Toronto's very own love doctor.

I recall that this friend was quite shy and barely spoke to girls at all, even as other boys in our grade began to notice the opposite sex.

I had to find out for myself if he was for real, or if this was just another ruse to get women interested.

L, as my buddy will be known, is quite the smooth talker over the phone. He oozed confidence and instantly put me at ease with his light-hearted humour.

But the phone is a bit like an Internet chat room: it's easy to pretend you are something you're not when you don't have to look into someone's eyes.

"What are the three biggest mistakes men make when it comes to women?" I asked, silently counting about 100 that he could mention.

He passed the test with flying colours.

Topping the list was using cheesy lines.

"I was out the other day and I actually heard someone say, 'My love for you is like diarrhea: I can't keep it in.' The girl could hardly keep her food in after that one," he said.

Next is buying her a drink – also a no-no.

"It's kind of like saying that your personality isn't good enough and so you have to buy them something to get them to talk to you," he explained.

Amen to that!

The third-worst mistake is complimenting a woman too quickly.

"That's what you call an instant 'ew'!" he said.

Ew indeed, unless of course it's sincere, and we women can always tell.

I was impressed, until I asked L to explain a bit about how his business worked.

It turns out that after an initial consultation, his client has the option of going out – whether it be to a library, bar or mall – with two girls by his side to act as his consultants throughout the night. Sometimes, the women will even approach a girl of interest to introduce her to the client.

That's when I knew L was missing the key ingredient in his so-called full-proof recipe for love – confidence.

I remember that when I was a teen hanging out at the mall with my friends, we would have the best time taking turns hiding from our crushes as the others would approach the cute boys and tell them that our friend had a thing for him.

It was fun for us back then, when we were 14, but now more than 10 years later, I'd rather forget I ever played that game.

Whether it's in the workplace or in the dating game, a little bit of confidence goes a long way toward making the right impression. Cheerleaders are always nice, but just like in any big game, cheerleaders stay on the sidelines, where they shout out their moral support. They wouldn't dare step onto the court to score for the players.

Why should the dating game be any different?

Sure, it's hard to be confident when you're playing a game that you have little experience or luck in.

But the point is that nice girls don't want to play the games we used to play when we were kids.

We want men, now – men who aren't afraid of taking a little risk and who think we're worth the risk to begin with.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I met this great guy a few months ago and we were really into each other. We spoke on the phone every night and saw each other as often as we could.

After a few weeks of dating, Jeremy told me that he loves me. I was so excited, and I told him I love him too. Since then, we have both started letting our hair down a bit more and we are getting more comfortable with each other. Personally, I think this is a good thing, but in the last few weeks I've noticed that Jeremy is starting to avoid my calls and making excuses not to see me.

I confronted him and asked him if he still loves me. He said he does, but he is not "in love with me." What the heck does that mean? I am very angry with him, and I think he is looking for a way out and is too much of a coward to make a clean break. How does it sound to you?

Does He or Doesn't He?,

Dear Does He or Doesn't He,

It sounds to me like Jeremy is sending out signals. It's never easy to face rejection, so it's natural to look for other reasons that may cause a person to behave in a certain way or to say certain things.

There are most definitely different forms of love, including love that you feel for your parents, children, pets and partners. Society has pretty much started using "love" as a catch-all word for most types of comforting and feel-good emotions. However, being "in love" is used exclusively to describe your feelings for your significant other. It signifies an all-encompassing love that includes passion, commitment and romance. There is a different intensity to it that doesn't exist in other types of love.

Chances are "he's just not that into you." There is a book with this title, as well as a Sex and the City episode and even a cereal commercial that incorporates this phrase.

Some men are simply too uncomfortable to make a clean break. Jeremy may really enjoy your company and may not want to hurt your feelings, so he is trying to take the easy way out. He is sending you signals so that you will take the necessary steps and he won't have to. You just have to realize that he is probably not going to be Mr. Right for you. Stop investing emotional energy with this guy and move on.

Indigo, anti-Semitism and you

URBAN WRITER

The time is now!

Anti-Semitism is on the rise. Anti-Israel activities are increasing internationally, and here at home. Yet we Jews have a bad habit. We are irresponsible at times with our lives as Jews, and with our beloved State of Israel.

Take Toronto for example. We know that anti-Israel groups have been increasing their activities on campus and against Jewish student groups, yet how many students are standing up bravely and fighting this challenge? How many resources has the community invested to ensure that this fight is being fought smartly and efficiently?

Heather Reisman's bookstores, Indigo and Chapters, have been boycotted by pro-Palestinian groups. Their members have picketed in front of the stores and jammed their lines with phone calls and faxes with the intention of forcing Reisman and her husband, Onex CEO Gerald Schwartz, to shut down their charitable organization Heseg (Heseg.com), which supports education and study for retired Israeli soldiers who came to Israel as volunteers from other countries (lone soldiers).

Isn't it time that every Jewish community member demands of our leadership a plan to include each of us in a strategy to fight this problem and to marginalize those who are taking shots at us?

Shouldn't our rabbis and synagogues have classes on what to do when we hear anti-Semitic epitaphs hurled at us in our place of work? What would Jewish professionals tell us to do if we're challenged by anti-Israel misinformation from a non-Jewish friend?

Our Jewish team needs to be prepared. This includes waking up those who have become too comfortable in our own environment, to the extent that many of us question the proliferation of anti-Semitism or express no interest in fighting it.

Again, where is the big plan? We are a small enough people that we can create a strategy that will prepare you and me to understand the jargon of the anti-Semite and enable us to respond to it; that will give us enough facts about Israel to be its emissary everywhere; that will protect our children and ourselves by implementing martial arts education and similar protective programs in our day schools and shuls; and that will create programs to make us more friends, particularly among communities that are amenable to learning about who we are as a people.

Putting together such a plan is very possible, especially in light of the fact our community is brimming with world-class planners, marketers, trainers and promotions people who can get the word out, and with philanthropists who have lots of money to underwrite such a program. We also have the minds to create think tanks to ensure that we undermine the quite formidable anti-Israel/Jewish propaganda machine that has been created and implemented around us.

Know that we are currently losing the propaganda battle and we should be disgusted by our lack of will. We lost in 2001 at the United Nations World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, when anti-Semitic and anti-Israel forces forged their campaign to delegitimize Israel with charges of racism. In addition, the anti-Semitic and anti-Israel forces tried to eliminate any mention of anti-Semitism as being a form of racism.

If I have offended you with my harsh words, I do not apologize. I am frustrated and tired of watching so many Jews attend Holocaust programs yet take a passive role when it comes to ensuring our safety and continuity.

This column is written for you. Enough self pity. No more light promises about support for our campuses and our students.

Composers often wake up with melodies in their heads. How often though do they fall back asleep forgetting those beautiful sounds.

Roll out of bed. The Jewish people are indeed a song, a beautiful song, and the time is now to write down that melody – to take action.

Fight, Jews! Be afraid, but do it anyway.

Think-tank targets Iranian threat

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

By now, the message should be abundantly clear: the threat from Iran, a dangerous regime that sponsors terror worldwide, will increase exponentially if it's successful in its pursuit of nuclear weapons.

So says the Israel Project, a Washington, D.C.-based, non-profit, non-partisan think-tank dedicated to "winning the war of words and images" being waged against Israel.

And if the message wasn't obvious to some, last week the organization embarked on an aggressive campaign to help the media – and by extension the public – understand the threat from Iran.

Jennifer Laszlo Mizrahi

It did so with what it calls an "Iran Press Kit."

On March 5, the Israel Project targeted more than 17,000 members of the U.S. media with an extensive national mail and e-mail campaign consisting of full-colour flyers with messages about what it calls Iran's duplicity regarding its nuclear program and its domestic fomenting of hate against Israel, Jews and the West.

It also targeted more than 40,000 pro-Israel leaders and activists across the United States.

As well, a Washington-area TV ad campaign extolling the democratic virtues of Israel began on March 10 and was slated to run for one week on the Washington feeds of the major news channels.

"We felt it was an important time to remind America's elected leaders who Israel is," Jennifer Laszlo Mizrahi, founder and president of the Israel Project, told The CJN in a telephone interview last week from Washington.

"People are very concerned with Iran, who they are aware is developing nuclear weapons and that their leader has said he wants to wipe Israel off the map… in defiance of the UN. [Americans] want to see something done."

One press-kit flyer depicts Iranian President, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, his face frozen in anger while speaking, with the message, "Iran's president denies the Holocaust and says he wants to wipe Israel off the map. Iranian leaders have supported attacks that killed thousands of Americans around the world."

The Nuclear Clock is TICKING...
...and time is running out.
At least 25,000 Iranians have signed up to become suicide bombers in the United States and Europe. Hundreds of Americans have died in attacks supported by Iran, the world's largest state sponsor of terrorism.
Iran continues to defy the international community and the United Nations by pursuing nuclear capabilities that can be used to build a bomb. Iran has even threatened to share this technology with other extremist countries.

Cohen family asks Syria for right to say Kaddish at brother's grave

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Members of Eli Cohen's family are appealing to the government of Syria to permit them to say Kaddish, the Jewish prayer for the dead, at the grave of the executed Israeli spy.

The proposed humanitarian gesture could be a first step toward rapprochement between the two Middle Eastern neigbours, said Avraham Cohen, the youngest of eight brothers and sisters from the Egyptian-born Cohen family.

Speaking by telephone from Israel, Avraham Cohen said the return of Eli's remains is the family's ultimate goal. However, Syria continues to use his late brother's body as a bargaining chip to extract concessions from Israel.

Avraham Cohen

Since Eli Cohen was executed nearly 42 years ago, successive Syrian governments have refused to release the body to his family in Israel. The family believes Eli has paid the ultimate price and simple decency requires that his family be given the body for a proper burial.

Over the years, there have been reports of diplomatic overtures to repatriate Eli's remains, but Ayraham Cohen said that could still be a long way off.

In the meantime, he said, "they can invite us, the family, to visit the grave of Eli and give us a sign – DNA evidence – that these are really the remains, and later they can negotiate with Israel for the price of Eli. That would be a humanitarian gesture."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Ahenakew to Return?

SASKATOON — The Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations (FSIN) is considering reinstating disgraced aboriginal leader David Ahenakew. Chief Irvin Starblanket said at a FSIN meeting earlier this month that Ahenakew should be reinstated, he told the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix last week. Ahenakew, a former leader of the Assembly of First Nations, was convicted of inciting hatred in 2005 for praising Adolf Hitler to a reporter in 2002. He was forced to resign from the FSIN and stripped of his Order of Canada. His conviction was overturned last year, but the crown appealed and his case starts next month. Other FSIN chiefs opposed reinstating Ahenakew.

Gift to Nursing School

TORONTO — Investment banker Lawrence Bloomberg gave the University of Toronto's nursing school a $10-million gift last week, the largest ever to a Canadian nursing school. In recognition of the gift, which will be used for scholarships and to lure professors, the nursing school will bear the name of Bloomberg, who founded securities dealer First Marathon Inc. and also chairs the Mount Sinai Hospital board and sits on the board of Baycrest.

CBC Bans Hitler Book

SASKATOON — CBC Radio forbade Booker Prize-winning author Yann Martel from reading parts of Adolf Hitler's Mein Kampf on air during Freedom to Read Week. Martel, who won the 2002 Booker for Life of Pi, said CBC staff told him he couldn't read from the anti-Semitic tract, which he planned to do at a Freedom to Read event later that day at the Saskatoon Public Library. The library had asked Martel to read from a banned or challenged book. He did a CBC interview anyway, the National Post reported.

Parade Held Outside

VICTORIA — What is believed to be Canada's only outdoor Purim parade took place March 4 in Victoria. Some 100 people were expected to take part in the Congregation Emanu-el event.

WORLD

Israel Least Liked

LONDON — Israel is the world's least popular country, a BBC poll found. The survey, published last week by the British broadcaster, found that 56 per cent of 28,000 respondents in 27 countries said they think Israel has a "mainly negative" influence on world events, while only 17 per cent said "mainly positive." Second and third in the rankings were Iran and North Korea. The United States ranked fifth out of 12 countries in the poll. The BBC said Israel's image, already hard hit by the intifadah, was further dented by last year's Lebanon war.

Cash for J. Studies

BALTIMORE — A University of Maryland alumnus will donate $1.5 million to his alma mater to create a chair in Israel studies. Jack Kay, a resident of Chevy Chase, Md., and president of Kay Management Co., is making the donation with the Kay Family Foundation.

Jews Urged to Flee

BUDAPEST — Hungarian Jews were urged to consider leaving during Passover for fear of anti-Semitic attacks. The rise of the far right during recent political upheavals in Hungary prompted local rabbis to run an ad in a Jewish newspaper telling Jews to go abroad for the holiday. "We are really afraid of the troubles that will happen on the street during the holiday and think that it is better to leave Budapest or just stay home," Jewish leader Peter Feldmeier told Ma'ariv.

Looted Art Reacquired

AMSTERDAM — The Netherlands bought back Nazi-looted art that it had returned to a Holocaust victim's heirs. The Dutch state agreed in 2006 to return more than 200 paintings worth millions of dollars to the heirs of art dealer Jacques Goudstikker, who fled the country shortly before the German invasion in 1940. He left behind his collection of 1,300 works, which were looted by the Nazis. The culture ministry is buying four paintings for $4.3 million (US). The heirs gave the state a fifth painting, Bartholomeus van der Helst's 1645 Child on Deathbed.

Lesbian Heads Group

PHILADELPHIA — The Reconstructionist movement named a lesbian to head its rabbinical association. Rabbi Toba Spitzer of West Newton, Mass., was elected at the group's convention this week. Spitzer is a 1997 graduate of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College and has been serving Congregation Dorshei Tzedek, a Reconstructionist shul in West Newton, for 10 years. In 1984, Reconstructionism became the first U.S. Jewish movement to ordain gay rabbis, a move followed by Reform in 1990.

Bishops Criticized

BERLIN — Jewish leaders were enraged by German Catholic bishops who compared conditions of Palestinians to those of Jews under the Nazis. The bishops made the statements after visiting the Yad Vashem Shoah memorial in Jerusalem this month. The remarks were "appalling and completely unacceptable," said Charlotte Knobloch, head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany. She said they falsely "impute racist motives" to Israel and use "cliches that are borderline anti-Semitic." The bishops rejected the criticism.

Jewish Group Condemns Soccer Hijab Ban

MONTREAL — B'nai Brith Canada says the Quebec Soccer Federation should change its rules and allow players to wear Muslim hijabs or other religious items on the field, and said not doing so is "a failure in reasonable accommodation."

Last month, 11-year-old Asmahan Mansour of Ottawa was ejected from a tournament in Laval for wearing a hijab, a scarf covering the hair and neck.

The federation's policy was upheld by the International Football Association Board earlier this month, but the board didn't call for other soccer organizations to ban the hijab. The Ontario organization, for example, allows Muslim female players to wear the scarf.

B'nai Brith said the Quebec rules should be more in line with those of other provinces. "The Quebec Soccer Federation's outright ban on hijabs, as well as other religious items, does not meet the requirements of the province's human rights code," said Allan Adel, a Montreal lawyer and national chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights. "The onus is on the federation to prove that it is excluding players from wearing religious items because they are justifiably dangerous, not simply because they are religious items."

B'nai Brith's 'indictment' targets Ahamdinejad

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

B'nai Brith's Institute for International Affairs is asking the government of Canada to consider a series of diplomatic and legal steps against Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad because of his repeated incitement to genocide of Jews.

The institute prepared an "indictment" of the Iranian president that was presented to officials in the Prime Minister's Office, the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, and to representatives of the United States and Russia last week, laying out the legal case against Ahmadinejad.

Group wants Iranian leader banned from Canada

The document sets out four steps Canada could take against the Iranian leader. They include banning his entry to the country, prosecuting him if he arrives despite the ban, calling on the UN Security Council to refer the case to the International Criminal Court and asking the International Court of Justice to find Iran in violation of the Genocide Convention for its failure to prosecute Ahmadinejad for incitement.

Human rights lawyer David Matas, senior counsel to B'nai Brith, authored the indictment and called the case against Ahmadinejad "pretty compelling."

The indictments notes Ahmadinejad's repeated calls for the elimination of Israel, his hosting of a Holocaust-denial conference in Tehran, his denial of the right to self determination by Jews and the Iranian government's efforts to develop nuclear weapons.

"Genocide is the most grave crime known to humanity," the indictment states. "Waiting for genocide to happen is not acceptable. Canada must act now against the threat of genocide Mahmoud Ahmadinejad poses."

Matas said Canada has been a leader at the United Nations in condemning Iranian human rights abuses, in particular for the government's role in the murder of Zahra Kazemi, an Iranian-Canadian photojournalist killed while being held by Iranian security personnel.

"Many voices from the four corners of the globe have called for charges to be laid against the Iranian president for incitement to genocide. We must now move beyond words to action," Matas stated. "The obligation to prevent genocide includes an obligation to influence others to act against the threat of genocide Ahmadinejad poses."

Matas said the document presented to federal officials makes "operational" a proposed indictment suggested at a December 2006 conference at the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs. At that conference, Ambassador Dore Gold, former advisor to Israeli prime ministers Benjamin Netanyahu and Ariel Sharon, along with human rights lawyers Irwin Cotler and Alan Dershowitz, called for incitement charges against Ahmadinejad. The centre published Referral of Iranian President Ahmadinejad on the Charge of Incitement to Commit Genocide, which was aimed at alerting world organizations to the threat posed by Ahamdinejad and stopping him before he commits mass murder.

"His apocalyptic utterances are not mere rhetoric," the document states. "Ahmadinejad's declaration that the Holocaust was a 'fairy tale' and his enabling of Hamas and Hezbollah demonstrate there is simply no way for his ambitions to be realized without perpetrating a new genocide."

In Australia, meanwhile, an opposition MP last week called on his government to urge the UN Security Council to refer Ahamdinejad to the International Court of Justice over his statements that Israel should be wiped off the map.

Shadow foreign minister Robert McClelland of the Labor Party said such a step would "move the international legal system from punishing genocide post-facto to preventing it before it occurs," the Australian Jewish News reported.

Matas contended that even if the Iranian president never faces trial, international legal and diplomatic efforts that single him out would strengthen moderates in Iran and weaken extremists.

"Even to the crazies, Ahmadinejad seems crazy," he said.

Perception outweighing truth

From the editor's desk

Last week, the BBC World Service released the results of a poll it conducted of some 28,000 respondents in 27 countries. It sought to ascertain which country they considered to be the best in the world.

Canada – the land of Northern Lights, the seal hunt, Tim Horton's, Wayne Gretzky, official bilingualism and ever-present Quebec separatism – received the highest marks from the respondents. About 54 per cent viewed Canada in a positive way; only 14 per cent held negative thoughts about the country.

Israel, on the other hand – the land of the Bible, hummus, falafel, Tel Aviv, the Mediterranean and the conflict with the Palestinians – received the lowest marks. Only 17 per cent viewed the Jewish state positively; 56 per cent viewed it negatively. Even Iran – the tightly controlled, theocratic, terrorism-sponsoring, mullah and police state – ranked ahead of Israel. Some 18 per cent saw Iran positively; while 54 per cent saw the country negatively.

In commenting on the results of the poll, Steven Kull, director of the University of Maryland's Program on International Policy Attitudes, which undertook the poll alongside the international consulting firm GlobeScan, said rather dryly in the final report: "It appears that people around the world tend to look negatively on countries whose profile is marked by the use or pursuit of military power."

The BBC GlobeScan results dovetailed with similar findings released late last year in the United States by the international consulting company GMI (Global Market Insite, Inc.). According to this study, called the National Brands Index (NBI), Israel was ranked last in terms of positive image.

The Index canvassed 25,903 online consumers in 35 countries – Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Egypt, Estonia, France, Germany, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Malaysia, Mexico, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Portugal, Russia, Singapore, South Africa, South Korea, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States – about their perceptions of the countries listed, in relation to six specific categories: investment and immigration, exports, culture and heritage, people, governance and tourism.

"Israel's brand is by a considerable margin the most negative we have ever measured in the NBI, and comes at the bottom of the ranking on almost every question," said Simon Anholt, a marketing consultant who worked on the study.

To be sure, there are many reasons to discount the validity of the surveys. Online surveys are notoriously unreliable. They are easily manipulated by clever users, with dishonest intent. Moreover, the results of the NBI survey themselves indicate a great level of inconsistency within the findings, suggesting the possibility of the deliberate targeting of Israel. For example, we are told a large number of respondents said they felt Israelis were the most unwelcoming in the world. Yet, they also said Israel was the last place they would plan to visit. If they haven't visited, how would they form the opinion that Israelis are unwelcoming? The conclusions cannot logically coexist.

And how, we ask ourselves, could Israel have ranked last in each category, and, as we are told, "by a considerable margin," without a deliberate targeting of the Jewish state?

Dry Bones
NOT JUST ANOTHER PRETTY FACE . . .
ISRAEL WAS JUST VOTED THE COUNTRY WITH . . .
THE MOST NEGATIVE IMAGE IN THE WORLD!
BUT WHAT ABOUT ALL THE REPRESSIVE DICTATORSHIPS? . . AND ALL THE COUNTRIES THAT APPEASE THEM?
THAT'S WHO GOT TO VOTE!
DryBonesBlog.com

The conclusions are counter-intuitive, counter-factual and, as all of us who have been in Israel can attest, counter-experiential.

For example, would U.S. industrialist Warren Buffet recently have invested billions of dollars in Israel if it was not a good place in which to invest? Would Intel continue to invest billions of dollars in Israel if it had a poor record on exports and research and development? Would nearly two million tourists visit the tiny country each year if Israelis were not welcoming?

The substantive conclusions of the survey are significantly disconnected from the substantive truth of the country.

But, even if we discount the reliability of the methodology of the surveys and take note of the severe disconnect between the reality of Israel as experienced by the millions of people who actually live, visit and do business there, and the opinions of the 29,000 respondents in the surveys about Israel, we cannot deny that the perception of Israel in many parts of the world, including in the western, developed, First World, is largely negative.

The conclusion is as heavy-hearted as it is inescapable: the propaganda campaign waged against the Jewish state – since the creation of the PLO in 1964 that was re-focused after June 1967, that inexplicably gained more supporters after October 1973 and that has reintensified each year after every battle Israel has had to wage in defence of its people and sovereign existence – has been successful.

We should not be surprised. Highly credible people like former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, the playwrights who lionized the late Rachel Corrie and Portuguese Nobel Laureate for Literature José Saramago, have all taken their turns demonizing the State of Israel. And over the years, the effect has been relentlessly cumulative. But if we should not be surprised, we should also not be withered. We dare not be.

Next week, some ideas about fighting back so that perception and truth might more closely align.

Religious fundamentalism motivates terrorism: psychologist

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Nearly a month since Israeli Apartheid Week was held on campuses across North America and Europe, campus and community groups answered back with Freedom and Democracy Week, a series of lectures about home-grown terrorism, religious extremism and the "war on terrorism."

The event, which was held at the Bahen Centre at the University of Toronto from March 5 to 8, was sponsored by Zionists at the University of Toronto, a chapter of Betar-Tagar Canada; B'nai Brith Canada; Hasbara Fellowships; Stand With Us; and the Canadian Coalition for Democracies.

It featured lectures by former Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) director David Harris, who spoke about last summer's foiled Toronto terror plot, and Los Angeles Times columnist Jonah Goldberg, who lectured on "Why the War on Terror is the Wrong War."

Steven Stein, a psychologist who has offered his expertise to the U.S. Air Force, Canadian Forces and special units of the Pentagon, and is the CEO of Multi-Health Systems, the largest Canadian publisher of psychological tests, presented a lecture titled "The Psychology of Terror: Inside the Head of Religious Extremists."

During his talk, Stein attempted to debunk myths, perpetuated by the western media, about lack of education, poverty and mental problems being the root causes of terrorism in the Middle East and suggested that it is religious fundamentalism that motivates terrorists.

Throughout his presentation, Stein referred to eight studies that specifically looked at the role that poverty and education play in terrorism.

He referred to a study conducted by Marc Sageman, the author of Understanding Terror Networks and a former CIA case officer who was based in Islamabad in the 1980s, who found that 71 per cent of Muslim terrorists had some college education and 43 per cent of the Muslim terrorists he studied were professionals.

Another study by Ariel Merari, an Israeli psychologist, conducted a study based on interviews with 182 Palestinian would-be bombers and the families of bombers.

He found that 88 per cent of the suicide bombers had a high school education or higher.

The Palestinian Centre for Policy and Survey Research released statistics that suggested that those with higher education were more in favour of killing civilians through acts of terror.

"What we see here is that 43 per cent of professionals versus 34.5 per cent of labourers support the killing of innocent civilians. The support is actually higher amongst highly educated people… The question you should be asking yourself is, what kind of education are they receiving?" Stein said.

Stein also offered statistics in an attempt to prove that poverty is not one of the factors that lead to terrorism.

He said that many of the terrorists who were studied came from middle-class backgrounds, and in two cases, the terrorists were millionaires.

To illustrate his point that poverty is not what drives people to terrorism, Stein compared a list of countries that support terrorism to a list of the world's poorest countries.

"I took a look at the World Bank's list of the poorest countries in the world to see if some of the terrorism hot spots are among those countries, and then I looked at the CIA list of the biggest supporters of terrorism and I got a very different list," he said, adding that countries such as Ethiopia and Honduras were two of the poorest countries in the world, but Iran and Pakistan topped the list for supporters of terrorism.

Stein, who said he has conducted many one-on-one interviews with people who were involved with terrorism and their families, referred to studies that demonstrate that mental health is also not a factor that drives people to terrorism.

He said that leaders of terrorist organizations tend to recruit "predictable" bombers who "have the mental capacity to carry out the act."

A study conducted by Nasra Hassan, the director of the United Nations Information Service, who interviewed failed suicide bombers – those who were caught or failed for other reasons – and their families, suggested that the terrorists did not display psychopathic or depressive tendencies.

In an attempt to answer the question of why people resort to terrorism and what motivates them, Stein referred to a study conducted by Assaf Moghadam, author of Roots of Terrorism, who found that most are motivated by religion, personal reasons, such as being awarded with 72 virgins upon their death, nationalist reasons, such as wanting to destroy the Zionist enemy, and economic reasons, such as wanting to provide their families with money, as bombers' families are rewarded monetarily for suicide bombings.

While cash rewards is one of the reasons people turn to suicide bombings, Stein said that it is time people understand that throwing money at the situation isn't going to help.

"We won't touch the school system, we won't touch the media, we won't touch any of that… We're afraid to touch those areas. We don't want to interfere with their country. It's like saying to the mafia in New York, you guys just take Brooklyn, just do whatever you want."

He said that while some may cite the "Israeli occupation" for the reason for terrorism in Israel, he believes that religion is the main reason. He said that it is the passion for the religion that drives terrorism.

"It is a duty, a call to God, it's what Allah wants. Jihad is religious. The Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade is religious, not secular. We've got to understand what is really going on," Stein said.

He added that while some may see the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as political, "getting rid of the Jews in the Middle East is both religious and political… but religion is so much more powerful than messianic or political reasons. If you do it for religion, it's got so much more power, it consumes your whole soul."

Free Israeli high school program 'an adventure'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Representatives of Israel's Elite Academy visited Toronto for the first time late last month to meet with prospective students and parents.

The "academy" is a program sponsored by the government of Israel and the Jewish Agency that offers three years of high school in Israel – either religious or secular – for free.

"They believe it will make [the students] be always connected to Israel, even if they don't stay [when the program is finished]," said Liane Sela, regional director of Toronto's Israel Aliyah Centre, which has started screening potential participants locally (previously they had to travel to New York).

The program in Israel is "an adventure for them, and they meet children from all over the world," said Sela. Other benefits are a strengthened Jewish identity and increased independence, she added.

The Elite Academy served students mostly from Russia, Argentina and Europe following its inception in 1992, but in the past three years, it has opened up to English speakers, Sela said.

There are 50 North Americans in the program now – five went from Canada last year – and four schools for North American teens: a secular school (which has kosher food and an on-site synagogue), a religious girls' school, a religious boys' school, and a Chabad school.

The program may appeal to people in communities without a Jewish high school, as well as those for whom the cost of Jewish education is prohibitive, and to students who just want "to have this opportunity… to be part of the Israeli nation and to have this adventure," Sela said.

Students receive room and board, travel money, pocket money, and medical and emergency dental insurance.

Toby Stupp, head of computer science at Neve Sarah Herzog in Bnei Brak, said the experience "is going to be fun," but it also provides a high academic level of education.

First-year students of the Elite Academy (called Na'ale in Hebrew) have separate classes until their Hebrew has improved.

In the Israeli system, students choose a specialty for their high school graduation diploma, said Stupp, a native of Ottawa.

Specialties range from computers and bioengineering to dance and movie-making, although there are at least half a dozen obligatory core subjects, she explained. Also, she noted, students with learning disabilities can usually be accommodated.

However, participants must be mature and capable of dealing with being away from home, she said. The program is open to students entering Grade 10 or 11.

If Elite Academy students don't have family in Israel, the program will match them with a host family that they can spend time with on holidays.

Students at her school come from a variety of Jewish backgrounds, said Nurit Cohen, vice-principal of Mosenson High School in the Mosenson Youth Village at Hod Hasharon, near Ra'anana.

But, she said, "the only thing that's important to us is that they are good students… and mature enough to adjust to the change. There's a different climate, different atmosphere, different food and different culture. It's not easy. It's a very good experience, but if you're not independent and can't stay away from home, it could be too difficult. If you want to, and you're able to do it, we help you to succeed."

There is no problem being accepted to university in North America after the program, Cohen said.

But it's also a "wonderful program" for anyone considering aliyah, said Stupp. If students do decide to make aliyah when the program is over, they are considered new olim and receive the same benefits as other new olim, even though they have already been in the country for three years, she said.

Stupp added that for families making aliyah, the Elite Academy program is a good option for their high-school age students.

Recalling her own experience, she said, "I know what it is to be thrown into an Israeli school without a special class [for olim]."

Anat Ashcenazi, who attended the meeting with her 14-year-old daughter Shiran Halyo, already has a daughter at Mosenson. Shiran's older sister Natalie heard about the program last year from friends and has been in Israel since September.

A public school student who attended Jewish day school for a few years in elementary school, Natalie "loves it" in Israel, although she was initially apprehensive about missing her family, said her mother, who speaks to Natalie several times a day.

After a December visit to Israel, Shiran is looking forward to starting the program next year. "The good part is that you get to meet new people. They're so nice. I met half of them [in December]. The bad part is that I'm going to miss all my friends I grew up with."

She said the program is "the experience of a lifetime."

Skepticism rising

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas met on Sunday for two hours in the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem. The meeting was their second in less than a month, thus fulfilling the promise they made to U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in February when the three leaders met in Jerusalem.

Israeli officials said the meeting was conducted in a "positive atmosphere." According to Ha'aretz, senior Abbas aide Mohammed Dahlan said the meeting was "difficult" and produced no agreements.

That the two sides characterized the meetings so differently was not surprising since each side was pitching to a different audience. The Israelis have to show that they are doing all they can to find a modus vivendi with the Palestinians. The Palestinians, on the other hand, have to show they will never knuckle under to Israeli demands.

It is hard to know what really transpired at the meeting. But reading between the lines, it seems certain new pieces are being readied for placement onto a much larger game board. One of those pieces may be kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit. And the board may soon encompass more players from wider afield within the region.

"Palestinian Authority Chairman Mahmoud Abbas will make an effort to secure the release of captured Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Shalit as soon as possible, and perhaps before the formation of the new PA unity government, Abbas told Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Sunday," Ha'aretz reported.

The Jerusalem Post relayed the possibility of Shalit's release with even greater conviction. "Kidnapped IDF Cpl. Gilad Shalit will be released 'soon,' Palestinian Authority Chairman Mahmoud Abbas told Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. According to the report, this was the first time that Abbas himself, as opposed to other PA officials, had indicated anything concrete regarding Shalit's fate. Abbas said that he would make an effort to see that Shalit was released 'this week,' according to Channel 2."

Abbas' ability to secure Shalit's freedom remains to be seen. We are entitled to remain skeptical. What has changed these past weeks to imbue the constantly equivocating, hitherto weak and ineffectual Palestinian president with such visibly renewed authority and confidence? Hamas controls Shalit's fate – not Abbas nor his Fatah fighters. Hamas and Fatah fighters are still killing each other. And Hamas has not changed its views on recognizing Israel, renouncing violence or abiding by all signed agreements.

The answer may lie in an apparently innocuous statement by Olmert before his meeting with Abbas. He said that Israel was willing to treat the 2002 Saudi peace initiative "seriously" and that he supported a regional summit to discuss the plan.

The Saudis are now more vigorously involved in the process, albeit still behind the scenes. For their own reasons, to be sure, they want to curtail Iran's growing menace. Israel is clearly encouraging Saudi involvement. But we're still skeptical.

25 years ago in The CJN

Five Canadian universities – Concordia, McGill, the University of Guelph, the University of Toronto and St. Mary's in Halifax – were negotiating with universities in Saudi Arabia about exchange programs. Concern was expressed that Jews would be discriminated against, but one Saudi official said only Zionist Jews would be forbidden from taking part.

Reply to Steinberg (1)

In "Reining in CIDA's radicals" (CJN, March 8), Gerald Steinberg lambastes the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) for its support of the publication Palestinian Refugee Repatriation: Global Perspectives.

Despite the impression left by his column, the book is not about supporting the Palestinian "right of return," "seeking to flood Israel with Palestinians," or "promoting the Palestinian position." Rather, the volume asks leading refugee experts what lessons might be learned about refugee repatriation from other global conflicts. The only two contributors from the region are one Palestinian and one Israeli – hardly an imbalance.

The book itself makes no presumption about whether Palestinians might return to Israel, repatriate to a Palestinian state in the West Bank/Gaza, or some combination of the two. The analyses offered are thus no contradiction with Israel's past negotiating position, as expressed in acceptance of the December 2000 Clinton Parameters, in the January 2001 Taba negotiations, or Israel's draft Framework Agreement on Permanent Status. In all of these, Israel accepted that Palestinian refugees had a right of repatriation to a future Palestinian state. In both, the Clinton Parameters and at Taba, Israel also agreed that it might accept very limited refugee return within Israel proper.

Ironically, in his haste to condemn CIDA, Steinberg misses some of the most interesting parts of the book. In my own chapter, for example, I highlight the extent to which the Palestinian Ministry of Planning undertook significant work on the absorption of refugees within the West Bank and Gaza. Clearly this revelation doesn't fit well with Steinberg's "seeking to flood Israel with Palestinians" theme, so he's chosen to ignore it.

Many of us who work on sensitive permanent-status issues, such as refugees, experience something of a bizarre response to our scholarship. Privately, both Israeli and Palestinian officials thank us for the work that we do in examining practical solutions to difficult issues. Publicly, hardline activists on both sides accuse us of somehow being Palestinian shills, Zionist lackeys, or indeed both. If peace is indeed to ever be built in the Middle East, however, it's probably more helpful to work with the builders than listen to the shrill and misleading rhetoric of the rejectionists.

Reply to Steinberg (2)

In his column ("Reining in CIDA's radicals," CJN, March 8) criticizing the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) for supporting the publication of the book Palestinian Refugee Repatriation: Global Perspective (Routledge), Gerald Steinberg did not review the book's 14 articles. He did not write anything about the conference at Exeter University, which resulted in the publication of this book. He did not mention the editor and his academic credentials, nor did he identity the contributors, all prominent academics and practitioners, or mention the excellent reputation of the publisher.

I participated in this conference and contributed a chapter to the book and find myself obliged to raise these issues for the benefit of readers of The CJN, so that they realize the column is neither accurate nor reliable.

Steinberg argues erroneously that by discussing lessons from repatriation experiences globally, CIDA and the book encourage terror and the destruction of Israel. This is not a legitimate argument.

JDL is challenging threats

In the letter to the editor "JDL's forum on terrorism" (CJN, March 8), the writer is sarcastic, comparing the Jewish Defence League's forum on terrorism to "the Happy Hooker organizing a seminar on chastity." The writer is surely unaware of the many positive accomplishments of the JDL in Canada. Has any other Jewish organization challenged the threats that are directly targeting the Jewish community worldwide? If not, why not, if not now, when? If we are not for ourselves, who will be?

Standard Theatre's excellence

I would like to confirm letter writer Bill Stern's opinion ("Toronto had the 'finest Yiddish theatre'," CJN, March 1) about the excellent quality of the shows that were performed at the Standard Theatre in Toronto. I was one of the locals hired to be a spear carrier in a couple of the plays presented by Maurice Schwartz and his company. One of them was Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice, a Yiddish version with Shylock as the hero and Portia as the villain! We played to packed, appreciative audiences every night. It was an unforgettable experience.

Organized Canadian Jewry: 'CJC's glory days are long past'

By HAROLD M. WALLER
(Part two)

By the 1970s, there were a number of trends in community organizational life that were becoming evident. Israel had become a central concern, even a focal point of community activity, the Canada-Israel Committee – backed by Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada, the Canadian Zionist Federation and later the federations – was the main community voice on Israel matters, the federations became the most successful fundraisers among Canadian Jews, and B'nai Brith was trying to define itself as an independent voice responsive to its membership.

These trends were clearly not helpful to Congress as it sought to redefine its role in a changing environment. They advanced because of influence from across the border, where the federation movement was more developed than in Canada and was setting an example that would be emulated by the Canadian federations, and because of the decline of the grassroots movements, often reflecting the concerns of immigrants, that had been an integral part of the Congress structure.

The result of this evolution within the community was that CJC had to become increasingly responsive to needs defined by the federations and could no longer chart an independent course.

These trends persisted through the 1980s and into the 1990s. The crisis in Israel affairs proved to be a permanent part of the political landscape. Recognition of this accentuated the need for centralized budgeting for countrywide needs. By the 1990s, communities with at least a few thousand Jews had organized themselves into federations and become part of the national federation structure. In the early 1990s, the 10 federated communities joined together in the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada, a body that meshed with its U.S. counterpart in the furtherance of matters of continental concern.

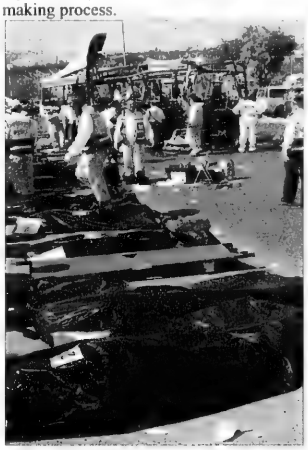
In a further consolidation in 1998, that council merged with the United Israel Appeal of Canada to form UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC), the current dominant countrywide body. While the new entity functioned well enough to deal with the ongoing issues facing the community, several developments led to questions as to whether the new structure was adequate to deal with emerging challenges.

Among those were the heightened awareness of the importance of effective political advocacy on behalf of the community in the face of increasing anti-Semitism, the intensified crisis involving Israel after the beginning of the second intifadah in 2000, and the necessity to confront Islamic terrorism after the 9/11 attacks in the United States. The terror war that Israel confronted led Canadian Jewish leaders to ask whether enough was being done in this country on behalf of Israel. In particular, there was concern that Israel's position in both public opinion in general and in elite opinion was deteriorating, that the media were not treating Israel fairly, and that government policy, especially voting at the United Nations, had tilted away from support for Israel.

The perception that a crisis was developing led an ad hoc group, made up mainly of wealthy Jewish businesspeople, to discuss possible actions that the community might take. The focus of the discussions of the committee was on the dysfunctional overlap between community organizations and the necessity to reform and rationalize the structures of many of them. Indeed it became apparent that each organization that advocated on behalf of the Canadian Jewish community needed structural reform, that there was often duplication in the delivery of services, and that there was a need to re-examine the community's scarce resources so that they could be utilized more efficiently and effectively. The conclusion of this analysis was that it was necessary to reorganize all of the advocacy activities of the community in order to improve the realization of the community's goals.

The committee's recommendations were adopted by UIAFC, beginning in 2004. The major innovation was to establish the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA). Existing bodies, such as Congress, CIC, the Quebec-Israel Committee, and National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL) would report to CIJA and, most importantly, receive their funding allocations through CIJA. This put the agencies with an orientation toward government and the political process under unified direction for the first time. All of them underwent some structural reform as a result and there was a consolidation of support services.

B'nai Brith is notably outside this structure, both because of its desire to retain its independence and because of a history of competition with other organizations. Clearly, the absence of B'nai Brith represents a tradeoff of more inclusiveness and a more unified community voice against a potentially divisive internal decision-making process.



Increasing anti-Semitism, as evidenced by the fire-bombing of the United Talmud Torah in Montreal, left, and the intensified crisis involving Israel, as evidenced by the suicide bombing in Haifa, right, according to the author, created the perception that inspired an ad hoc community group to take steps that eventually led to the estblishment of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA).
[Photos by Howard Kay and Israpet]

The new structure reduced CJC's autonomy even further, but advocates of the new arrangements contended that the benefits outweighed the costs. Specifically, they predicted that there would be financial savings resulting from a more rational structure and that the quality of the programs carried out and services delivered would improve. A crucial element in all this was the injection of additional funds into CIJA from the committee members, thus augmenting the advocacy programs beyond what UIAFC could afford on its own.

As for Congress, its role has had to become much more sharply focused over the years as other bodies have encroached on what had been its turf. After the latest reorganization, it's clear that its glory days are long past. It still has a key role to play, but it's a more limited one than in the past. In some ways this has proved advantageous, according to current CJC president Ed Morgan. In conversation with Morgan for this article, he said he was pleased that the changes have enabled his organization to focus more clearly on what it can do that is most important for the Jewish community. In that sense the new structure has been a positive development, enabling Congress to do a better job on traditional concerns such as anti-Semitism, war criminals, and community relations. Moreover, CJC has moved into new areas of responsibility, specifically developing relationships with labour unions, left-wing movements, and especially the aboriginal community.

For Morgan, the main point is that the Jewish community's advocacy needs are being met more effectively than before, regardless of where CJC fits into the organizational structure. As a result, he clearly views the reorganization in positive terms.

In the new structure, the key bodies are the board of directors and the steering committee of CIJA. The board, currently chaired by businessmen Brent Belzberg and Steven Cummings, includes some people who were involved in the original committee that recommended the CIJA structure.

In principle, CIJA is accountable to UIAFC, but in practice has considerable autonomy within its defined sphere of responsibilities. Hershell Ezrin is CIJA's CEO and is guided by the board. The budget of CIJA, one of its most crucial functions, is the responsibility of the steering committee. That body has established a very complicated process to consider the various applications for funding and then make decisions on allocations. It's an elaborate process that requires from six to 12 months for each budget.

One of the results of the new approach has been to increase the layers of bureaucracy that separate the decision makers from those who actually implement policies. There is a certain irony in this, because what has been created is a corporate type of environment, which is much different from what used to prevail in Jewish community organizations. That is not necessarily good or bad, since it is the results that matter. One of the supposed advantages of the corporate model is that it provides cleaner, more sharply defined decisions through a relatively uncluttered hierarchy. That stands in sharp contrast to the very messy processes that typically characterize Jewish community organizations. But perhaps it is inevitable that imposing a corporate model on existing organizations will necessitate new bureaucratic processes.

(Next week: the advantages and disadvantages of the new, corporate model for community advocacy.)

Harold M. Waller is a professor of political science at McGill University and co-author of Maintaining Consensus: The Canadian Jewish Polity in the Postwar World.

Opinions

What is a Canadian Jew?

I am a Jew and proud of it. I am also a proud American and Canadian. Each part of me is a complex mixture of memory, lived experience and appreciation. That's not to say that I don't see problems, deficiencies and even failures. Nonetheless, I am appreciative. Yet, I'm also perplexed by my compatriots.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

American Jews seem to have integrated their patriotism, their American-ness with their commitment to Judaism. Many are not blind to the problems they face, but willing to stand up as American Jews while they challenge the system. Some even accept Jewish diversity rather than assume uniformity. But Canadian Jews are often unable or unwilling to articulate their commitments to all their multiple identities.

Often I hear people proudly proclaim: "We are not Americans!" As though being American is a bad thing. Obviously, I don't think it's a bad thing and wonder at this negativity. One can disagree with a political position and still see the merits of a social entity and cultural form. More importantly, one really cannot define one's own identity simply via the negative. There must be a positive side of "Canadian" and more specifically of "Canadian Jew."

It should be based on some knowledge as well as experience. There are many accomplishments of the Canadian Jewish community that are worthy of consideration and even esteem, but too many of us are not conversant with history. Did you know that the first Jew to land on these shores was supposedly a woman by the name of Esther Brandeau? They sent her back when she would not convert. Did you know that in the 19th century, the president of Montreal's Spanish and Portuguese synagogue was the police chief of Montreal?

There are many stories that highlight our heritage here and our contribution to Canadian culture. Just think of all the artists and writers. Add to that all the current Supreme Court justices. If I were to list all the names of these Jews, this column would go on and on. Our world has been enhanced tremendously by the presence of Jewish Canadians, and few of us know or appreciate the full significance of their story.

Thankfully, today there are many resources and places to find out more. Aside from books, lectures and classes, there are three universities with special programs in Canadian Jewish studies (Concordia, York and Ottawa). The opportunities abound. Follow Hillel's dictum: go and learn. With knowledge will come a real sense of positive identity and pride in being a Canadian Jew.

I think it's a good thing to be patriotic – not narrow-minded or imperialistically chauvinistic, just simply proud of one's country and its accomplishments. And in Canada, there is much to fuel our pride and challenge our activism.

Can a call from the spirit be denied?

Recent decisions taken by the the Conservative movement's committee on law and standards regarding ordination of gays and lesbians put the cat among the pigeons. The committee adopted conflicting policies on ordination and "blessing ceremonies" for gay couples. (Four members wanting to uphold the existing ban on ordination and gay marriage resigned. That resolution, passed in 1992, barred gay and lesbian students from Conservative seminaries and prohibited rabbis from performing gay marriage ceremonies.)

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Briefly: three proposals were submitted. The most liberal was rejected. A second was passed – based on the interpretation that the prohibition against homosexual sex was a rabbinic one – that permitted non-anal homosexual sex and supported both the ordination of gays and lesbians and commitment ceremonies. A third, also accepted, argues that gay and lesbian sex is prohibited by biblical law and, therefore, rejected both ordination and commitment ceremonies.

Individual rabbis and synagogues will decide what to take from this exercise.

As a follow-up to the decisions, a poll sponsored by the Jewish Theological Seminary surveyed the attitudes of Conservative clergy, leadership and individuals and came up with a long series of statistics. Again briefly, in all cases more than half endorsed both gay ordination and a ceremony marking gay couples' commitment to each other. Not surprisingly, that was not true of Canadian Conservative rabbinical responses.

That one committee could come up with clashing rulings is not strange. Certainly, in the development of Jewish law, there have been many diverse opinions, and the Talmud is not remiss in reporting them all, including those that directly conflicted with the majority opinion, their concluding opinion introduced by the phrase, "But the sages say…" Thus one navigates the sea of Talmud.

For many, the votes on gay ordination and marriage – or "blessing ceremonies," as they are termed in the resolutions – only confuse the issues to be addressed. For others, any resolutions accepting gay and lesbian ordination are an abomination and will lead to the dissolution of the Conservative kehillah. For still others, the divisions mean that any decisions come to the chupah, so to speak, in pallid clothing, with so many layers of nuance that you cannot see the people underneath.

Readers of daily newspapers will know that Protestant denominations are facing similar dilemmas. In particular, the Anglican Church is caught in the same trap, with North American congregations apparently supporting the inclusion of gay clergy and marriage ceremonies, while congregations and clergy overseas – especially in Africa – are threatening to secede.

Some predict that Jewish Conservative congregations, especially in Canada, will similarly consider leaving the Conservative movement. I would doubt that, although there will be confusion.

Some of my Orthodox friends have approached me on the subject. I seem to hold some radically left-wing opinions as well as some right-of-Conservative–centre ones, no doubt another sign that one can contain many contradictory things – rather like the character in Alice in Wonderland, who could believe six impossible things before breakfast.

Let's begin with the ceremony issue. The Torah assumes that marriage will always be between a man and a woman, and that a family will naturally follow. Homosexual behaviour was something that occurred in a cultic setting – where male prostitutes and female prostitutes were an integral part of pagan worship rites. Later the Hellenistic world viewed (male) homosexuality as a natural bond between men, especially since women were considered a very inferior species. No one considered the fact – one that today is pretty well established – that sexual preferences seem to be innate. Human sexuality being the tangle that it is, there should be no surprise that homosexuality is part of our genetic make-up. How can we deny this need for human loving relationships?

Now to the ordination of gays and lesbians.

When a person feels called to become a rabbi – or minister, priest or nun – can this call from the spirit be denied? It seems cruel to deny the inner voice that speaks to a person and calls him or her to the life of service to a religious community. I do not recall anywhere in the Bible God asking those he chose as prophets, priests and kings what their sexual preference was. They heard the voice and answered "hineini." That should be the test.

Remembering the Sharpeville Massacre

10 a.m, March 21, 1960, Sharpeville, South Africa, a township south of Johannesberg

A large crowd of black South Africans assembled in front of the police station to protest pass laws imposed by the apartheid government. The laws required black South Africans to carry identity documents with them.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

The police had been reassured by the leaders of the assembly that it would be peaceful, but nonetheless, the police were highly apprehensive.

A scuffle broke out at the front of the demonstration. A police officer was pushed down. The front row of the crowd was pushed forward as marchers from the back wanted to see what had happened. Suddenly the police opened fire without being given an order to do so. In the end, 69 protesters were killed and 180 were wounded – some while trying to flee. This became known as the Sharpeville Massacre.

Six years later, in 1966, the United Nations declared March 21 the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination. On Dec. 20, 1983, the General Assembly called upon all states and organizations to participate in a Program of Action to combat racism and racial discrimination.

Does the world really need a day dedicated to the elimination of racism? Are we not civilized enough to recognize the deleterious effect of all forms of discrimination?

Apparently not. Throughout history and even in our contemporary world, people have been suffering under the weight of racism and genocide, including the genocidal horrors in parts of Africa and the Balkans.

Occasionally, the world attempts to address issues of racism – most recently in 2001 at the United Nations World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerances in Durban, South Africa. The objectives of the meeting were laudatory and, indeed, some delegates came away feeling that great progress had been made. The conference, however, deteriorated rapidly as the pro-Palestinian movement virtually hijacked the meetings in a systemic and organized fashion.

There were actually three meetings in Durban – a youth forum, a non-governmental forum and the official, governmental meeting. The first two meetings, in particular, became nothing less than anti-Semitic and anti-Israel events with hateful taunts and jeers and public displays of anti-Semitism.

Israel and the United States pulled out of the conference. The documents arising from these meetings were hateful and destructive. Although the Declaration and Program of Action produced by the official governmental meeting had some merit, they were also deficient.

In addition to anti-Semitism, the conference organizers had to deal with the issue of black nations around the world seeking reparations for slavery. Both the anti-Israel/pro-Palestinian and black redress issues pushed the conference to the brink.

Jews around the world are sensitive to the issues of genocide and discrimination as the memories of the Holocaust are etched into our community fabric. However, it is important to set aside at least one day to remind the world about the evils of all forms of racism.

How do we, in Canada, mark the March 21 anniversary of Sharpeville? In Alberta, the Northern Alberta Alliance on Race Relations (NAARR) encourages and supports events organized by schools, post-secondary institutions, ethnocultural organizations, community groups and religious groups.

One Edmonton-based non-profit, non-governmental organization, the Canadian Multicultural Education Foundation (CMEF), annually sponsors a Harmony Brunch commemorating March 21. This year's 10th annual Harmony Brunch includes a keynote address by Alberta lieutenant-governor Norman L. Kwong.

The Harmony Brunch is a celebratory event, but more importantly, it is a reminder of the importance of combating racism. Racial discrimination is an irrational and horrific manifestation of human behaviour. It has a destructive effect on any society.

The International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination can serve to deliver an upbeat message; namely, that there are many who care, many who want to see a world free of racism, hate, bias and all sorts of prejudice – a world without any Sharpeville tragedies.

* * *

On March 21, 1986, when former prime minister Brian Mulroney proclaimed, in the House of Commons, Canada's participation in the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, he said: "Let us all work toward the day when racism and racial discrimination become history and when every Canadian can participate fully and equally in the life of our country."

The Kirshner File

Israel and Turkey cultivate a key relationship

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert visited Ankara last month in a tangible expression of the importance Israel attaches to its strategic relationship with Turkey, the first Muslim nation to recognize the Jewish state.

Widely considered to be Israel's chief ally in the Middle East, Turkey, as Olmert acknowledged on the eve of his two-day visit, is "an important country economically [and] diplomatically." In fact, as he deliberately neglected to mention, given Israel's unpopularity in Turkey at the grassroots level, Israel also has close military and intelligence relations with Turkey, the sole Muslim member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Olmert and his host, Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan – who paid an official visit to Israel in May 2005 – discussed a wide range of mutually relevant issues, from Iran's desire to acquire a nuclear arsenal to the current political impasse between Israel and the Palestinians since the election of a Hamas government in January 2006

But in a nod to Turkish public opinion, Erdogan – Turkey's second Islamist prime minister in a decade – raised a number of sensitive matters of concern to both countries. Erdogan, who has met with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, pressed Olmert to ease restrictions on the Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and urged him to work with Fatah and Hamas leaders, who have pledged to form a national unity government. Erdogan also asked Olmert to respond positively to Syrian peace overtures and criticized Israel for allowing construction near the Temple Mount in eastern Jerusalem.

From Olmert's point of view, it could have been worse. On his last official trip to Turkey in July 2004, when he was minister of trade, commerce and employment, Olmert's planned meeting with Erdogan was abruptly cancelled after Erdogan, in a swipe at Israel's assassination of Hamas figures Ahmed Yassin and Abdel Aziz Rantisi, bitterly described these targeted killings as "state-sponsored terrorism" and recalled Turkey's ambassador in Tel Aviv for "consultations." To add salt to the wound, Erdogan claimed that Israeli policies in the West Bank and Gaza had inflamed global anti-Semitism.

Erdogan's critique, though probably unprecedented since Turkey's decision in 1991 to upgrade ties with Israel to the ambassadorial level, shocked Israelis and sent bilateral relations reeling.

Despite Erdogan's blasts, the Turks went out of their way to welcome Olmert and his delegation, with President Ahmed Necdet Sezer and Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul both conferring with him before he returned to Israel. To soothe sensitivities and emphasize the point that Turkey values its friendship with Israel, Erdogan – a product of Turkey's Islamic movement – dispatched three of his closest aides to Israel in the wake of Olmert's visit. Their message, as parliamentarian Omer Celik declared upon arrival in Jerusalem, was that there is no "crisis" in relations between Turkey and Israel, and that Turkey's bonds with Israel "are based on very strong foundations."

The Turks, who have repeatedly said that they reserve the right to criticize Israel when circumstances warrant it, left Olmert with an identical message following his latest visit to Ankara. Shortly afterward, representatives from Israel and Turkey met at a conference in Jerusalem to solidify economic co-operation. The conference, sponsored by the Manufacturers Association of Israel, the Israel Export Institute and Turkey's embassy, was designed to enhance trade, which has quintupled since the signing of a commercial agreement in 1997.

Last year, Israel and Turkey did $2.4 billion (US) worth of business, excluding military sales. Israel's main exports to Turkey run the gamut from telecommunications and electronic equipment to chemicals, while Turkey's exports to Israel range from textiles to building materials and supplies. Twenty years ago, before Turkey decided to bolster its relationship with Israel, bilateral trade totalled only $54 million (US).

Turkey's rapprochement with Israel began after the Madrid peace conference, the collapse of the Soviet Union and the start of the Oslo peace process. Until then, Turkey – nominally a secular state since the 1920s – more or less kept Israel at arm's length as it courted the Arab world.

But after disputes with Syria and Iraq over the waters of the Euphrates and Tigris rivers and the Kurdish problem, and fears that Muslim radicalism was taking hold in the region in the aftermath of Iran's Islamic revolution, Turkey's attitude toward Israel warmed.

Prior to these developments, Israel made strenuous efforts to develop good relations with Turkey and countries on the periphery of the Middle East in an attempt to ameliorate Arab hostility. The Turks, however, did not respond, being dependent on Arab oil and Arab backing in their increasingly rancorous dispute with Greece over the future of Cyprus.

Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan meets Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas

According to Israeli scholar Efraim Inbar, the diplomatic turning point in Israel's gradual rapprochement with Turkey occurred in November 1993, when Turkey's foreign minister, Hikmet Cetin, visited Israel. It marked the first time a Turkish foreign minister had set foot in Israel. Turkish dignitaries followed, and Israel responded in kind.

Turkey realized that better relations with Israel could be useful in furthering its interests in the United States by countering the Greek and Armenian lobbies and convincing American public opinion that it was worthy of full membership in the European Union.

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni confers with Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul in a recent meeting

But even before Cetin's appearance in Jerusalem, Israel and Turkey signed a defence co-operation accord. This led, three years later, to an agreement under which the Israeli and Turkish air forces were allowed to use each other's territory in training flights.

In 1996, Turkey's chief of staff, Gen. Cevik Bir, visited Israel. Since then, Israel's and Turkey's chiefs of staff have regularly exchanged visits. In addition, Israel has won lucrative contracts to upgrade Turkey's fleet of F-4 Phantom jets and M-60 tanks. Two years ago, Israel beat out the United States and France to supply Turkey with drones.

Reports suggest that Israel and Turkey share vital intelligence data, particularly with respect to Iran's budding nuclear program and Syria's current military buildup. Until quite recently, Turkey's ties with Syria were tense, having been strained by Syria's support of Kurdish separatist leader Abdullah Ocalan (who was eventually turned over to Turkey). Turkey has since improved relations with Syria, but the Syrians still covet lost territory in Hatay province that France cavalierly handed over to Turkey in 1939.

For Israel, Turkey is a key supplier of fresh water. In 2001, after several years of drought, Israel signed a 10-year agreement to purchase 50 million cubic metres of water per year from Turkey. Two months ago, the Israeli and Turkish governments tentatively agreed to build a network of pipelines to ship Turkish potable water, as well as oil and natural gas, to Israel.

For Turkey, Israel is a source of vital income from tourists. Last year, more than 300,000 Israeli travellers went to Turkey.

"Turkey's relationship with Israel is based on mutual interests, and as long as it is mutually beneficial, it will continue," Turkey's former ambassador to Israel, Feridun Sinirlioglu, has said. "I think this is an important relationship, and we should try to protect it as much as possible."

For Israel and Turkey, this observation, grounded in Realpolitik, rings true.

Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund climbs over $300,000,000

Sheldon Esbin and Arthur Resnick manage the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund

Canadian investors can choose from an array of hundreds of investment types: from volatile stocks to low interest GICs. Yet more and more investors are turning to the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund. In the past year alone, investor contributions have added more than $100,000,000 to the Fund.

The Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund is an income fund that pays interest monthly. Over 95% of the Fund is invested in commercial first mortgages, all secured by the respective properties. Contributions are RRSP and RRIF eligible.

While the Fund has grown tremendously, our strategy continues to be conservative, and our performance continues to provide investors with annual distributions in the 10% range.

Canada needs strengthened anti-terrorism law now

By BRENT BELZBERG

Guest Voice

The recent parliamentary vote in which most of the Liberal opposition ignored its own former justice minister, committee members and Senate recommendations led to the sunset of two significant provisions of the anti-terrorism legislation that a previous Liberal government had initially introduced.

But surely no one questions that Canada still needs strengthened anti-terrorism legislation. In our current minority government situation, the Liberal Party will be carefully judged on whether it can come to terms with its own internal divisions and settle on a package of amendments that it can support by working with the government.

While it has been suggested that the first victim of this vote has been the ability to advance the Air India enquiry, all Canadians, including those of us who hold civil liberties paramount, know that we cannot have our institutions and values used against us in the struggle to fight global terror. And from a Jewish perspective, how many times do we have to show our elected representatives that our community organizations, schools and synagogues require around-the-clock protection before they comprehend that there is a clear and present danger.

In the wake of the attempt by a Montreal-based refugee claimant to bomb the Los Angeles airport and the terrible attacks of Sept. 11, 2001 the Canadian government came to the realization that Canada was wholly unprepared to respond effectively to the now undeniable threat of international terrorism and its domestic manifestations. By the end of the year, Canada's legislative response, the Anti-Terrorism Act, was on the books.

In its wisdom, Parliament "sunsetted" two of the most contentious measures subject to a new vote. These two provisions – recognizance with conditions (placing express constraints on the activities of suspects or permitting their preventive arrest for up to 72 hours as sanctioned by a judge to prevent an imminent terror attack) and investigative hearings (compelling individuals to testify and provide documents about a terror attack that has occurred or will take place) – seemed to epitomize the zero-sum game of protection of security versus protection of human rights.

While aware of their specific impact on civil rights in Canada, we believe that the powers of recognizance with conditions and investigative hearings were critical elements to be used judiciously to head off future attacks, or successfully investigate ones that had already occurred. It is in the latter context, in fact, that the RCMP was preparing to use the investigative hearing provision to break the Air India case.

And our community has made relevant and timely interventions to extend the two measures with additional safeguards put in place. As recommended by Canadian Jewish Congress in its September 2005 submission to Parliament, we hoped that these would include the establishment of a new parliamentary officer who would annually assess these two specific provisions to determine their continued necessity.

Terrorism remains a real and present danger necessitating a clear, cohesive and adequately funded response plan that is at once effective in protecting Canadians from terrorism and free of discrimination in its implementation and perceived adverse effect. And, we would argue, one need not approach the debate from the "either/or" perspective of security versus rights. If terrorism is rightly regarded as an assault on human rights and its effects as crimes against humanity, it stands to reason that the implementation of counter-terrorism measures necessarily protects the highest priority rights of life, liberty and the security of the person, the foundation of all other rights and freedoms.

The corollary, of course, is that these actions themselves must always be rooted in, and comport with, the rule of law. A properly framed and implemented counter-terrorism policy enhances civil liberties and core Charter of Rights values and protects them as part of our way of life whose essence is threatened by terrorism. From our perspective, as a package deal, the Anti-Terrorism Act met this challenge

The failure to renew recognizance with conditions and investigative hearings has eroded Canada's safety and security from both international and domestic attacks. These powers may be gone, but Canadians should not be lulled into a false sense of security – the threats that these provisions were intended to combat are most assuredly still with us. It would be the ultimate irony if in striving to maintain civil liberties we strip authorities of the necessary powers to stop terrorists from destroying our open and free society.

We, as a community, must hold every party and particularly the opposition accountable for ensuring that new legislation is quickly passed. Our communal safety is too precious to risk in the name of some perceived parliamentary insult or gamesmanship.

In my view, the Conservative government's approach to anti-terrorism legislation got it right.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

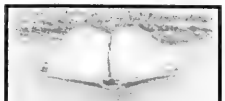
Jewish diamonds

By RABBI MENDEL KAPLAN

"Have you heard about the family that has headed the DeBeers diamond cartel for the last century, the Oppenheimers," the man asks in his unmistakably South African accent.

"No," I respond.

"Well," he excitedly continues, "listen to this story about a rabbi who actually had the guts to stick to his principles for a change."



Not such an anomaly, I think. I've seen rabbis like that before. In fact, I'd even like to believe that I might qualify as well, but I say nothing.

His words tumble out: "This guy Oppenheimer was so assimilated that he opted to formally renounce Judaism and join the Anglican Church. There's a synagogue in South Africa that carries his family's name because the family had financed its construction. This Oppenheimer offered to purchase a new property for the community and fund the construction of a new structure. The sole condition was that the Oppenheimer name be permanently erased from the establishment."

With a gleam in his eyes, he ends with a flourish: "And you know what? The rabbi flat out refused the offer. Now that's what I call a rabbi with principles!"

That's impressive. I should know. I'm in the midst of raising the necessary funds for the expansion of our own synagogue and community centre, and I haven't yet found anyone to do it.

"That's quite a tale," I admit, "but it's not the rabbi's chutzpah that moves me. The story's subtext is far more powerful, and it's Oppenheimer who really amazes me."

"Why?" he queries incredulously.

"Because," I respond, "try to think about a logical motivating factor to spend a mini-fortune just to erase a name. Clearly there is something buried deep inside this guy that is an incredible testament to the eternal and indestructible nature of the Jewish soul."

Even if a Jew formally renounces or leaves Judaism, we believe it always remains with him. It may sink and disappear beneath a superficial façade of assimilation, conversion or atheism. It might even hide there undetected for a very long time but it's there, and it comes with an unpredictable nature.

Some call it Jewish guilt, others a genetic predisposition or complex. We call it the pintele Yid (literally, "the dot of Jewishness") or the neshamah (soul). Like a blaze that can never quite be extinguished, only covered in embers, it can always explode into flame when you least expect it. Sometimes all it takes is a little bit of well-intentioned prodding.

Rabbi Sholom Dov-Ber Schneerson, the fifth Rebbe of Lubavitch, once defined a Chassid as a "streetlamplighter."

Before the days of electric light, street lights had to be kindled by a person wielding a long pole with a fire at its tip. He would go from lamp to lamp to kindle them, in rain, sleet or snow.

To the skeptic who maintained that he saw no lamps, the Rebbe said, "That is because you are not a streetlamplighter. When one cleanses himself, thereby becoming more spiritually refined, then one begins to see the lamp within the other."

When the late Lubavitcher Rebbe recounted this, he added: "The lamps are there, but they need to be lit. It is written, 'The soul of man is a lamp of God' [Proverbs 20:27], and it is also written, 'A mitzvah is a lamp and the Torah is light' [Proverbs 6:23]."

A Chassid is the person who puts his personal affairs aside and goes around lighting up the souls of Jews with the light of Torah and mitzvot. Jewish souls are in readiness to be lit.

And so, for those who think that some lanterns can never burn again, a South African diamond magnate's unconventional desire unwittingly reminds us to think again. Become a Chassid, seek out and ignite another neshamah today!

Matzah? It's complicated

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

Ah, the seder! Some of us have seders so long that by the hand washing the matzah has begun to rise and the kids are asking for seconds of maror. Some of us have seders so short that we ask the four questions, eat and are home in bed by 9! What shall we do with this holiday that we love to hate?

We obsess over every detail of cleaning, menus, whom to invite and whom we hope doesn't invite us. This is the night when women come exhausted to the seder table to hear about freedom. What do we do when the grand themes of slavery and redemption get overwhelmed and lost under new and ever more complicated food restrictions that make Ashkenazim wish there could be conversion to "Sephardism?"

There's a joke about a blind man who, when handed a piece of matzah by a friend, runs his fingers along it and asks, "Who wrote this stuff?" But for me matzah is no joke. Pesach is all about the matzah. This tasteless, shapeless cracker – reviled by Atkins and South Beach, forbidden to us the day before but commanded to us on the first night – makes all the difference and opens up the deeper meaning of Passover.

Matzah exists, like us, in a world of contradiction.

First, eating matzah forces us to live in two worlds at the same time: the cozy kitchen of our matzah ball soup and the uncomfortable place of our cream cheese and jelly "cracker" sandwiches when we go outside. It sets us apart and marks us at school or at work, to be known as we were known in Egypt – as strangers in a strange land, as those "others" with their exotic and interesting folk ways. It reminds us that our safe warm kitchens are not our only worlds.

Second, matzah forces us to live in the present and the past at the same time. It beckons us to the world of our fathers and mothers, with their time-honoured recipes, their matzah brei that no one else can make quite the same way, their seders when we were kids, and that deep sadness of missing them so badly when they are gone from our own grown-up seder tables, or when they are there but frail, ill, easily tired and forgetful.

But matzah also grounds us in the present, in our responsibility to teach our children what we know and to admit what we don't, to download one more resource from the Internet before the seder, and to contemporize and give new meaning to the rituals, lest they become as stale as last year's matzah.

Third, the matzah is a double symbol. It's the bread of freedom and "the bread of affliction" at the same time. How can it be both? The answer is that the meaning lies not in the bread, but in the conditions under which it is eaten. This contradictory nature of matzah as both freedom and affliction is a matter of attitude. Attitude changes everything. The bread of affliction is eaten as a victim. The bread of freedom is eaten as a victor.

Think it's simply matzah? Think again. Enjoy it, as we enjoy life itself, with all its endless complications.

Jewish Life

The economics of Passover

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

One of the guiding principles in responding to questions of Jewish law is the economic impact that one's decision will have on the questioner. The subjective principle of hefsed meruba (a great monetary loss) allows, and perhaps obligates, one to override many of our rabbinic prohibitions. It even allows for the non-performance of positive biblical commands if the cost of observing a mitzvah reaches 20 per cent of a person's income (biblical prohibitions can only be overridden only in cases of pikuach nefesh – danger to life, and according to some authorities, limb).

The expense of making Pesach make this issue most germane. Especially at this time of year, those of means must be most conscious of their communal obligations to the less fortunate (and there are many such people in our community). The laws of Pesach, as codified in the Shulchan Aruch, begin by describing the mitzvah of maot chitim, providing the poor with the basic holiday necessities, holidays being a time when poverty takes a greater mental toll than usual. The codes discuss residency requirements both for those giving and receiving the charity, requirements that in many ways parallel those found in Canadian tax code vis-a-vis determining residency status for tax purposes.

Pesach is a time when many Jews from across the religious spectrum are more meticulous in their religious observance. Nonetheless, one must be careful that these "higher" standards not come at too high a price. A person who receives a subsidy for Jewish education, for example, should not be spending upwards of $20 a pound on hand-made matzah when perfectly kosher matzah is available for a fraction of the price. Rabbinic leaders would commonly decree communal boycotts of items when they felt that prices had been unfairly raised, depriving even the rich of such items as fish for the holidays.

However, nothing has had a more profound effect on the economics of Passover than the selling of chametz to a non-Jew for the duration of Passover. A cursory reading of the Torah makes it quite clear that we are to destroy all remnants of chametz in our possession, so using a legal fiction to transfer ownership to a non-Jew seems, shall we say, unkosher.

Yet, in our modern-day economy, legal fictions – a.k.a., corporations – have been created for the sole purpose of making it easier to make money and avoid personal responsibly for corporate losses. Lawyers and accountants constantly concoct plans to legally present transactions in ways that will be beneficial to their clients, who pay good money for such advice.

A simple common example will suffice, one that's applicable to those who have both mortgages on their homes and other investments. By properly structuring a mortgage, the interest can be made tax deductible, saving thousands of dollars in taxes, all because of a legal fiction. Selling chametz is really no different, being a legal way to creatively avoid a monetary loss.

That being said, until the advent of modern refrigeration, when food did not keep for long, destroying chametz (or giving it to your non-Jewish neighbour) cost little, consequently there was no need (or desire) to sell chametz. But in our modern-day economy, where people can have thousands, and those in the food industry millions, of dollars worth of chametz, our rabbis applied the talmudic maxim that "God is concerned for the money of the Jewish people."

Where feasible, and not onerously expensive, it seems appropriate that instead of relying on the sale of chametz, one should donate the food to a food bank – thereby getting rid of our chametz and fulfilling an act of tzedakah at the same time.

Jews behind bars

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Visiting prisons certainly isn't glamorous, and raising the money to maintain Jewish prison programs isn't easy. But dedicated volunteers, rabbis and laypeople fan out across North America month after month to do just that. Here are some of their stories – and how you can join them, if you want.

Twenty-year-olds Chaim Bronstein and Ari Shapiro spent last summer on a different kind of road trip. As part of the Chabad chaplaincy program, the young rabbis from Brooklyn travelled the backroads of California visiting Jewish inmates in the 39 state and federal prisons.

"It is a very harsh environment," Bronstein said, "but it's specifically here in this environment where the human soul is so desperate for connection. Many of the inmates are so grateful for our few minutes together. It's amazing to see what kind of emotion it brings out of a person… And if someone wonders, what are we doing here? I say, this is Chabad. We're here to help." [http://tinyurl.com/yzlg4k]

The National Association of Jewish Chaplains provides support for "rabbis, cantors and other Jewish professionals functioning as Jewish chaplains in hospitals, nursing homes and geriatric centres, hospices, psychiatric facilities, correctional centres and the military." Their site quotes from Psalms 147:3, "God is the Healer of the broken hearted and the One who binds their sorrows." [http://najc.org]

There's room for you in prison even if you're not a rabbi. Mike Top has visited inmates on behalf of Jewish Family and Child Services of Toronto as a volunteer chaplain. [http://tinyurl.com/2lepy9] "Am I making a difference? I wish I knew… I have no illusions. If I'm making any changes, they are so microscopic as to be virtually undetectable in the grand scheme of things. But each individual in this world changes the world in some fashion. It is up to us, using the free will that the Holy One, blessed be He, has granted us, to choose whether that change will be positive or negative." [http://tinyurl.com/35uxu4]

You don't have to enter a prison to maintain contact with a Jewish prisoner. Jewish Prisoner Services International runs a pen pal service and has an online application form at its website. [www.jewishprisonerservices.org/] It calls pen-palling safe, pleasant and rewarding, but also offers important advice for anyone interested:

- Do not use your home address.
- Do not send family photos to prisoners.
- Do not ask why a person is in prison.
- It is acceptable to discuss religion, politics and personal philosophies, but don't ever proselytize, evangelize or otherwise pressure a pen pal to "see it your way." [http://tinyurl.com/36l3v8]

While many Jewish prisoners seek the companionship of a Jewish chaplain or look forward to the opportunity to read a Jewish book, a disturbing and somewhat bizarre phenomenon is happening at the same time. Throughout the system, there are non-Jewish prisoners who suddenly discover Judaism and demand what they see as the perks that go to Jewish inmates. And the system complies. As I learned from a fascinating feature in Seattle Weekly, "In Washington, as in most states, a prisoner fills out a form declaring his or her religion, and the state accepts that declaration at face value. It doesn't matter if a prisoner was born a Baptist and has been a known member of a white supremacist organization for decades. If the prisoner now claims to be an Orthodox Jew, in the eyes of the state Department of Corrections, he is now an Orthodox Jew." [http://tinyurl.com/2dwmhz]

Gary Friedman, chair of Jewish Prisoner Services International, didn't buy these conversions and has been sued by several inmates who claimed their civil rights had been violated when they didn't receive kosher meals. Last year, the case against him was thrown out, but not for reasons that totally satisfied Friedman. The judge said Friedman couldn't be sued because he is not a state employee. [http://tinyurl.com/2o7ppl]

There is a Jewish tradition to recite a prayer, the Gomel, when one is delivered safely from a life-threatening situation. Although it is more commonly recited after recovery from a serious illness or a return from a perilous voyage, the blessing is also recited after release from a dangerous imprisonment. "Baruch ata… hagomel l'chayavim tovos shegmoloni kol tuv – Blessed are You Ha Shem King of the Universe, who bestows good things upon the guilty, who has bestowed every goodness upon me." [http://tinyurl.com/ytseze]

Adding fun makes seders kid-friendly

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

At Karmela Klasner's annual seder, formality is out and fun is in.

Last week, as part of a program on "Passover Perspectives – Giving New Meaning to your Matzah" put on by the sisterhood of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Klasner and Monica Nemani presented a workshop called "Engaging Children in Lively Passover Seders."

The two women, each of whom has an early childhood education diploma, a preschool instructors' certificate, and 25 years' experience working with children, work at the synagogue's Tikvah Tots program.

"Remember that Haggadah means 'to tell,'" said Nemani. "The whole point is to tell the story to your children and get them involved in the seder." She recommends asking them "lots of questions" and rewarding them with prizes "that they like."

Among the prizes the women use at their seders are Webkinz (small stuffed animals like frogs that children can register and interact with online), stickers and sticker albums, movie passes, hockey cards and hats or T-shirts from favourite sports teams.

A number of their suggestions involved activities to do with children up to a week or two before the seder, like decorating plastic dollar store cups with "jewels" or creating a personalized placemat using labels from the children's favourite Passover foods, and then having it laminated. Nemani said the items create memories and can be re-used at seders in coming years. "My grandchildren love to come and do crafts."

At Klasner's seders, where she and her husband host between 30 and 40 people on both nights, a highlight is "Passover Jeopardy," usually played between courses of the meal.

"Everyone gets into it," Klasner said. A sample Passover Jeopardy board at the presentation dominated a table full of ideas – among them Passover books, CDs, finger puppets and crafts – at the front of the room. The large, three-sided board, available at office supply stores, was divided into categories – Who Am I?, Potpourri, Israel, Food, and Mathematics – each with five questions for an increasing number of points. The questions, all related to Judaism or Passover, are taken from the Haggadah, the Internet or books like the Jewish Book of Why, and are written on cards placed in paper pockets on the board. One of the questions under "Food," was "Name the items on the seder plate." Prizes are given for correct answers.

Instead of just reading the Haggadah, Klasner and Nemani recommend the use of props to enhance the story. One year Klasner's husband Jerry used mothballs for hail to illustrate one of the 10 plagues. In subsequent years, he threw ping pong balls and cotton balls.

Suggestions for making the ten plagues come alive, on a handout provided at the workshop, include red food colouring in a cup of water to represent blood, and green spots on plastic cows to represent cattle disease. Nemani and Klasner also had on hand a store-bought package of items representing the plagues, each of which can be given to a child to display at the appropriate time.

Another way of engaging children is to make a deliberate mistake when telling the story of the Exodus from Egypt, said Nemani. Prizes can be given to children who catch the error. She suggested having parents review the Passover story with their children ahead of time. "The more they know, the more they'll be able to participate and enjoy it."

Ensure non-Jewish seder guests feel 'part of' the proceedings

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

There's plenty of good solid scholarship that says there is good reason to have non-Jews at the seder, according to Rabbi Wayne Allen.

Speaking last week at a workshop on non-Jewish seder guests at a Beth Tikvah sisterhood program called "Passover Perspectives – Giving New Meaning to your Matzah," the rabbi noted that having non-Jewish guests at the seder has become an increasingly important topic of Jewish discussion.

Because of an increased rate of intermarriage, many Jewish families have non-Jewish relatives, he noted. Also, multiculturalism, along with mutual respect and co-operation among religions, has influenced Jewish young people who bring home university roommates and friends "to see what a seder is about."

He raised – and answered – questions like:

- How can we justify it?
- Will it change anything?
- Are there things we might want to exclude for the sake of tolerance, or things we need to explain?
- If non-Jewish family members are present and all family members are going to be participating, what role might there be for non-Jewish family members?"

Rabbi Wayne Allen

Going back to the Torah (Exodus, chapter 12), Rabbi Allen said that foreigners were not permitted to "eat of the Paschal lamb." However, he noted, in biblical times, the Passover seder was "quite short... Now, it's a full-blown meal with accompanying liturgy" that has been added over time.

By the Middle Ages, when the seder had evolved to include a "very rich Haggadah" and different symbolic foods, the Sefer Hachinuch, a work on the commandments of the Torah, discussed two cases where Jews may not eat of the Paschal lamb but did not address the question of non-Jews. "The implication is that non-Jews may attend the Passover seder," Rabbi Allen said.

Another possible obstacle to having non-Jews at the seder is the Jewish law that deems wine handled by non-Jews to be "degraded from its sacred purpose," said the rabbi. However, he said, now that most kosher wine is pasteurized, or boiled (mevushal), that is no longer a problem.

Further problems are that Jews are not allowed to cook on yom tov for non-Jews, nor are they allowed to teach Torah to non-Jews.

But there are answers to each of these questions, Rabbi Allen said.

"Nobody cooks extra [specifically] for non-Jewish guests. There's always extra, so we're not going out of our way to cook for non-Jews."

Also, he said, teaching Torah to Jews in the presence of non-Jews is permitted. "It's not that we're trying to teach non-Jews. They just happen to be on the side." A number of contemporary Orthodox authorities endorse that viewpoint, added Rabbi Allen, who is president of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly, Ontario region.

"We are left with no serious objections [to having non-Jewish guests at the seder]," he said. "But what about positive statements?'

He cited Rabbi Maurice Lamm, an Orthodox author, regarding "two good reasons" for including non-Jews, specifically family members.

"If we exclude them," said Rabbi Allen, "it will create rancor, even enmity."

Also, he added, having non-Jewish guests, "enhances the integrity of the Jewish people. One of the fine things [guests] will learn is the important values for which we stand."

It also "counters some of the outrageous claims that were made in the Middle Ages," he said, referring to allegations that Jews used the blood of children to make matzah.

Rabbi Allen noted that the opening of the door for Elijah has been explained as a reaction to the blood libel. "When non-Jews believed that Jews were doing something nefarious behind closed doors, we opened our doors."

As to the question of what non-Jews can do at the seder, Rabbi Allen recommended that hosts ensure their non-Jewish guests feel they are part of the proceedings, while at the same time doing "justice to what is exclusively ours."

As a general principle, he said, "we want to protect the integrity of the liturgy and reserve what is uniquely ours. [The Haggadah] celebrates the beginning of the covenant, the special relationship between God and the people of Israel. It's not something we share indiscriminately."

If the host goes around the table asking people to read from the Haggadah, and then asks a non-Jewish guest not to, that can cause embarrassment, said the rabbi. He suggested assigning non-Jewish guests readings that are not part of the actual Haggadah, to help explain the story – and arranging in advance that the supplementary reading will coincide with the guest's turn. Alternatively, a seder leader can just read the Haggadah and "everyone can join in," or can assign readings randomly.

If this means a change in longstanding tradition, Rabbi Allen told The CJN the change "has to be thoughtful, grounded in the sources, and communicated in a way that will not be offensive."

For passages that might be considered insensitive to non-Jews, "it's clear that some words of explanation are in order... You have to explain that they are in reaction to the treatment of Jews in certain historical periods, and they are not meant to offend anyone today who is respectful and cooperative."

Torah learning a lifelong pursuit, rabbi says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The Jewish community is confronting an age wave, says the director of Hiddur, the Center for Aging and Judaism in Wyncote, Penn.

In Toronto, said Rabbi Dayle Friedman, 15.4 per cent of Jews are over 65, and 9.3 per cent are between 55 and 64.

"That means that 24.7 per cent of the Toronto Jewish population is over 55, and the fastest growing group is [made up of] those over 80," said the rabbi, whose centre, part of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College, is dedicated to drawing upon Jewish tradition to enrich the lives of Jews as they age.

Rabbi Friedman spoke last week at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. Her lecture was titled "A Season of Splendour: A Spiritual Vision for Aging" and was sponsored by Kolel: the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

The community's aging is creating a "new age. We have fully two generations of people considered elders. Baby boomers, who are now 60 plus, can look forward to decades of relatively good health, and there is no [distinct] line between their working life and their next life," she said.

"It is a time of opportunity and freedom, and it is a time for caregiving – of parents, of younger children, and [even of] older children," the rabbi added.

"It is also the time to face the possibility of extended periods of chronic illness and frailty."

Rabbi Dayle Friedman

More and more people are growing older, said Rabbi Friedman, but society continues to dread aging. "Our tradition, [however] does not share a dread of aging. Abraham invented old age. He begged God to give him wrinkles and grey hair.

"According to our tradition, later life is a rich and beautiful time. Moses was 80 when he led his people out [of bondage.]

"These experiences do not tell us that aging is easy, but they suggest that it is an inevitable part of life, and it is mystery to be lived."

The word hiddur, she said, has two meanings in Hebrew. "One meaning is beauty, and the other is shining or radiance. We are supposed to bring beauty and radiance to the face of older people. It is a mitzvah to allow their faces to shine.

"This is a different radiance than that imagined by the beauty industry."

By bringing the Torah to older people, she said, "we are giving them [a chance to shine] by offering lifelong learning, a deepening spiritual connection, and the ability to contribute to the multi-generational community."

Rabbi Friedman, who taught an adult confirmation class at a Philadelphia nursing home, said Jews must find ways to empower older people to connect to the community.

"These people had to come to class, take part in a mitzvah project – they raised money for an after-school program in Israel – and take part in a service."

Over the course of nine months, one woman broke her hip, and another was diagnosed with a fatal illness.

"She came to class as her health declined, and she died knowing that she had accomplished something deeply meaningful to her. She continued to reach her potential [until the end]," Rabbi Friedman said.

"[In this class we proved] that the capacity to contribute is not tied to our physical abilities. We can all be receivers and givers. We need to reach out beyond where we are."

Quoting Rabbi Moshe Chaim Ephraim of Sudlikov, grandson of the Baal Shem Tov, Rabbi Friedman said that "spiritual aging causes one to become stagnant, and evaporates vitality and pleasure. It causes withering and physical aging, even in one's youth.

"Baal Shem Tov wrote, 'do not forsake me in old age: let not old age and stagnation rule my habits and customs.'"

TO ZIMBABWE WITH LOVE: After a recent talk on village life in rural Zimbabwe given by Meriel Gordon, Eva Kay, Marleine Kay and Rachelle Zwaigenbaum of Advocates for Humanity, grades 3 and 4 students at Temple Kol Ami School decided to reach out to the impoverished village children. They wrote decorated letters describing their lives in Canada and the story of Purim. They also made colourful masks and bought candy, paper, pencils, stickers and crayons so the children could write back. Pictured with the students and some of their masks and letters are, back row from left, teachers Karen Lidor and Ronit Baran; Eva Kaya and Marleine Kay; and teachers David Bernstein and Penny Schwartz.

Keep it specific for kids

Particularly for guests who are not as familiar with the Passover story, Klasner suggests telling them ahead of time what they will be responsible for knowing, and keeping it specific – the four sons and the four questions, for instance.

Klasner has also incorporated elements of theatre into her seder. For Chad Gadya, she said, everyone can act out the animals in the song. Also, she noted, someone can dress up as Elijah the prophet, and enter the room when the door is opened for him. "Kids get the biggest kick out of that."

"Keep asking questions," recommends Nemani. "Find all the fours at the seder. What are the four things that we drink?"

To make things easier for the adult hosts – and offset some of the cost – Klasner recommends assigning tasks like making the charoset (she suggests using new recipes, not the typical one) or picking up kosher for Passover wine or cookies. As a guest, she said, she appreciates being told what her host wants, "because then I know they're going to use it."

She sets up a play area for her youngest guests, with items like puzzles and even playdough. "It's not fair to expect kids who are really tiny to sit at the table all the time."

Also, she said, "When you're hiding the matzah, it's important to have certain areas in the house that are off limits, because your house will never be the same. Tell them [for example] that it's on the main floor, not in the back room or in the garage."

Passover can be fun, said Klasner. "All the holidays can be fun." Although she admitted that the preparation is a lot of work, "it's not all about work."

For more ideas, Nemani recommends livelyseders.com or googling "passover for children."

Holocaust play attracts wide spectrum of students from across the GTA

No More Almonds, No More Raisins completes successful Toronto run

By SHOSHANA POZNANSKY
UJA FEDERATION

More than 1,100 students, including over 600 from outside the Jewish school system – got a first-hand look at what life inside a WWII ghetto was like recently as they witnessed No More Raisins, No More Almonds. The Holocaust play consisting of children's ghetto songs performed by Montreal high school students recently wrapped up its stint at Toronto's Leah Posalns Theatre.

Through song, laughter and tears, the 40 youthful players imparted an eye-opening lesson to Jewish and non-Jewish students alike. Instead of trying to picture six million Jews, or one-and-a-half million children who perished in the Holocaust, the students in the audience could identify with and see the children on stage as no different than themselves.

Across the GTA, as a part of the grade 10 Canadian History curriculum, students learn about the Holocaust. They learn that six million Jews were murdered and persecuted. They open up their textbooks and see the facts and figures. The lucky ones get to hear survivors speak in person.

This play offered a different perspective.

"As an educator, to teach this way imprints a lasting message upon students, for whose generation, the Holocaust is distant. The eternal message is that racism exists and does not discriminate, even against children," said Cresswell whose grade 11 class is completely non-Jewish.

Ishan Purani, a 16 year-old Humberview student agrees that the play was an important learning experience. "Before seeing the play, I didn't know anything about ghettos, and I was very impressed by how convincing the portrayal of the ghetto was," said Purani.

Cresswell plans to debrief with his class about the various messages that stood out. He uses lessons of the Holocaust in his world religions class as examples to illustrate how people turn to their religion for comfort. Cresswell says many of his students see religion purely in the form of milestone-marking rituals.

"This play emphasizes that children in the ghetto turned to their religion on a regular basis, because their Jewish heritage was all they had," explained Cresswell.

During the performance, the lines blurred between the lives of the actors and the reality of the audience members. After the play, one man in the audience, rose to the microphone and said, "I am one of them. I survived. It reminds me of my childhood. Thank you very much."

"Theatre is a great way to learn history because you develop a special understanding through an emotional connection to the actors," said Ariella Getrajhendler, a grade eight drama teacher at Forest Hill Public School who brought a number of her students to the play.

Gurman Mann, a 16 year-old Humberview student took the lesson of courage and determination from the play. "The play showed times of true desperation, yet the children managed to stay positive. Through this play, I have gained a better understanding of how children can face and survive persecution."

Turning a cold winter's day into One Cool Day

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

One hundred volunteers from Hands on Toronto (HOT), an initiative of UJA Federation's Impact Toronto Division, recently took to the cold and blustery streets of the GTA to lend a hand at a number of mitzvah projects throughout the city.

Chaired by Bram Belzberg, One Cool Day 2007 participants rolled up their sleeves at a choice of 13 projects where they not only helped those less fortunate, but got together with other Impact Toronto volunteers aged 25-40.

Participants were invited to assist at any one of the following Jewish and non-Jewish locations:

•The Good Shepherd Homeless Centre where volunteers helped with a variety of activities that included making beds, folding laundry, sorting both clothing and food.

•Reena Foundation: volunteers spent time visiting adults and children who are developmentally delayed and helped them enjoy arts and crafts and sports.

•Help make a House a Home: Here HOT volunteers assisted family clients of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), a UJA Federation agency, in painting their apartments.

"Words cannot describe how elated my client is after Michael Hershfield and his HOT team came to paint his apartment," said the superintendent of a subsidized apartment building on Finch Avenue.

His tenant, a JF&CS client, who wished to remain anonymous, cried after meeting with the UJA volunteers. "Before, I came home to a clean apartment. Now, I will be coming back to my home," said the man. "They not only painted, but tended to things we never imagined they would. They completely scrubbed my bathroom from top to bottom, cleaned my floors and even provided me with a new comforter."

Volunteers from UJA Federation's Hands On Toronto (HOT) initiative, Sherri Silver and Ashley Faust, lend a hand at the Toronto Child Abuse Center during HOT's recent One Cool Day.

Project leader Michael Hershfield was clearly pleased with not only his team's performance on One Cool Day, but what they took with them from the day of voluntarism.

"For all of us, this was such an incredibly special and important day," he said. "It doesn't matter who you are, affiliated, unafilliated, what your background is or what you do for a living. When you see a man cry with happiness because of something you did, it's impossible not to feel great about yourself. It's amazing to have the opportunity to give back like this. Hopefully we can do more of this in the near future."

As another project leader during One Cool Day, Rachel Iskov chose to help out at an organization close to her heart.

"My group worked together to create art cards for one of MukiBaum's major fundraisers, their Gala event," she said. "I worked with a terrific group of women who were excited to participate in the project, and together we made an important contribution to both communities. We strengthened our ties with the Jewish community and built relationships while helping MukiBaum prepare for their event. I was moved by the energy and compassion that my group brought to the project."

"One Cool Day is a great example of how Toronto's young Jewish men and women can come together to truly make a difference," said Belzberg. "Partially due to the success of One Cool Day, we're hoping to make HOT a regular event and establish a deep volunteer network among Toronto's young Jewish community."

One Hot Day takes place on June 17. For more information call 416.631.5817 or visit www.impacttoronto.com

New centre makes volunteering in Israel a snap

Volunteering in Israel just got a whole lot easier for Torontonians thanks to a new initiative created by UJA Federation and its overseas partner, The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI)

The Israel Volunteer Program Center - operated out of the Israel Aliyah Centre in the Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services - is the place for people interested in getting involved in short-term volunteer programs in Israel.

A volunteer through the new Eilat Volunteer Centre poses with two Eilat youngsters.

One of the most popular volunteer opportunities offered by the Centre is in Eilat for a minimum of six weeks; everything is free except the flight. Some of the volunteer options include teaching children English in schools, working at a hospital or on the beach.

The Eilat/Eilot Region is twinned with Toronto's Jewish community through the Partnership 2000 initiative.

Jordana Warner 21, a fourth-year sociology student at the University of Western Ontario, heard about the program from her cousin who participated in 2005. Warner worked this past summer at a day camp with young children. "I liked the staff, I loved working there, it was a great atmosphere, and I had a great time," she enthuses. "I now truly understand the amazing impact that the Toronto community has on Eilat and why being a volunteer from Toronto in Eilat is so rewarding."

Wendy Newman graduated from Dalhousie in May 2005 and wasn't sure what to do with her summer. She didn't want to come back to Toronto; she wanted to be in Israel so she decided to volunteer in Eilat where she worked in an elementary school. "I helped out in an English class; working both one-on-one with the students and helped the teacher facilitate the lessons," she says. "It was a challenging but very rewarding job."

Member of WWII German Resistance headlines Yom HaShoah commemoration

Family of Baroness Sybille Niemoeller von Sell involved in plot to assassinate Hitler

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

As a young girl growing up in the Berlin suburb of Dahlem, Sybille Niemoeller von Sell, a Christian baroness born from 350 years of nobility, was not permitted to finish high school because of her refusal to join the Hitler Youth.

"What I was taught at home around the dinner table from my parents, were the most elementary rules of decency; to always look out for those who suffer injustice," Niemoeller von Sell said during an interview with Jewish Toronto. "My parents were the best examples of goodness and compassion."

On Sunday, April 15, Mrs. Niemoeller von Sell, who turns 84 next month, will be the keynote speaker at a Yom HaShoah commemoration service at Toronto's Earl Bales Park beginning at 11:00 a.m.

This event, held to honour the victims - and the heroes - of the Holocaust, is co-sponsored by a number of community partners with organizational support provided by UJA Federation, Yad Vashem and B'nai Brith Canada.

Baroness Sybille Niemoeller von Sell

With high school no longer an option, the teen began training as an actress and dancer at Berlin's renowned State Theatre Academy and after graduation became an actress in Dansig, Essen and eventually Berlin.

Niemoeller von Sell's family was active in an underground railroad, hiding and transporting Jews, and was heavily involved in the ill-fated plot to assassinate Hitler on July 20, 1944. Her cousin, Werner von Haeften, had carried the case with the two bombs. Upon capture, Haeften was shot and Sibylle and her father were arrested by the Gestapo. After extensive interrogations and physical abuse, Sybille was released. Her father, kidnapped from prison by Russians during the battle of Berlin, starved to death in a Soviet prison.

"I still remember when I was a teenager; the men would come to our house under the cover of night, to meet with my father to plot this assassination attempt. While I was not privy to what they were saying at these meetings, I knew what was in the air, it was understood what they were trying to do," she says.

This courageous youngster grew up with the same principles as her parents, and would go on to become a vital component of the WWII German resistance.

She later married Pastor Martin Niemoeller, a German hero of the First World War and a leader of the church's opposition to Hitler.

In fact, it was Pastor Niemoeller who penned the now famous quotation related to the Holocaust: "First they came for the Communists, but I was not a Communist, so I did not speak out. Then they came for the Socialists and the Trade unionists, but I was neither, so I did not speak out. Then they came for the Jews, but I was not a Jew so I did not speak out. And when they came for me, there was no one left to speak out for me."

Pastor Niemoeller passed away in 1984.

"After the war, I was certain that I would never again be able to speak about the Holocaust, I never wanted to talk about the war again," explains Niemoeller von Sell who converted to Judaism in 1990.

But that all changed after the death of her husband when she received a condolence telegram from a stranger the next morning. It was, as they say, the start of a beautiful friendship.

"The day after my husband died in March of 1994, I received a beautiful telegram from Elie Wiesel. We immediately became good buddies; I still tell him all the time that he invented me."

Wiesel - a Nobel Peace Laureate and Holocaust survivor - convinced the reticent Neimoeller von Sell to share her stories of the Holocaust with others.

"I didn't think I could do it, but Elie kept telling me that I must, so, I did. After my first public speaking event at a synagogue in New York, it was as if the floodgates had opened," she recalls. "I have not stopped speaking about the Holocaust since that day. The message of the Shoah must be told and, as long as I have a voice, as long as I am able to speak, I will educate as many people as I can about its horrors. I have a responsibility, as a witness to so many Nazi atrocities, to let people know what really happened."

Alumni of birthright israel give back to the community

By SHOSHANA POZNANSKY
UJA FEDERATION

Since its inception in February 2000 more than10,000 young adults from the Greater Toronto Area have participated on a free, 10 day Taglit-birthright israel trip through Canada Israel Experience (CIE), a UJA Federation partner organization.

To keep these young men and women interested and involved in the Jewish community, the birthright alumni community was created with programs catering to alumni interests ranging from social events to Israel advocacy.

Alumni are encouraged to get involved in community programs, including all major UJA Federation events.

One example of a program offered by the Birthright Alumni Community is called Me, Myself & Israel: Alumni Photo Exhibition & Auction. This event annually draws 150 people and last year raised $1,200 for UJA Federation's campaign to help the residents of northern Israel.

Alumni of CIE Taglit birthright israel reunited at the General Assembly (GA) held in Toronto in November 2005.

Another important way to keep alumni involved following their trips is through intensive leadership training.

"When the leaders are passionate about their ideas and their ideas turn into programs, the participants directly benefit because they see how connected and passionate those leaders are," explains Shauna Waltman, Alumni and Outreach Manager for CIE.

Fallon Butler was a participant on the Young Professionals CIE trip in January 2007. She has since attended programs which help connect her to the myriad of opportunities available.

"For those of us who wish to sustain the insight we received on our trip, the alumni community helps us stay connected with our new peers, seek out more of our spirituality and provides the chance to give back to the community," said Butler.

David Goodman experienced Taglit-birthright israel last February as a participant and upon his return, created an event called Hoops 4 Israel. What started out as a small fundraising idea only six months ago will likely raise $100,000 on April 1st with the proceeds going to underprivileged Ethiopian youth in Kiryat Moshe, a neighbourhood of Rechovot.

"My goal was to raise money and get young adults involved to demonstrate that they too can make a tangible difference and influence others to get involved. I want this program to be a message to the community that this is a great return on what you have invested in birthright," said Goodman.

Hoops 4 Israel – a charity basketball tournament - is bringing together 90 young adults, half of whom are birthright israel alumni, who might otherwise remain uninvolved.

Ehren Gluckstein, a Taglit CIE madrich (trip leader), finds that the birthright Alumni Community is there to support alumni in all avenues whether their intentions are to change the world or merely keep in contact with friends.

"The birthright israel program is only meant to plant a seed in the hearts of participants. By organizing alumni events, we are helping that seed to grow by giving alumni a variety of avenues to explore," said Gluckstein.

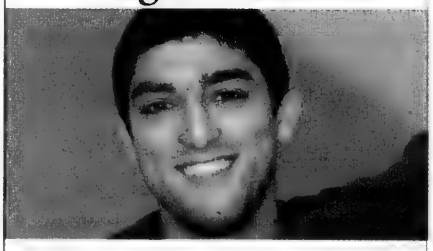
A young man's chance for higher education



Assaf Dahan, 23, was born and raised in Kiryat Shmona. Despite the difficulties of living in a city that has been victimized by endless terrorist attacks and Katyusha rockets, Assaf feels that his home is still an excellent place to raise a family.

"Personally, I am not scared to live in Kiryat Shmona," says Assaf. "However, there is not enough investment in the city – in infrastructure, business, and most importantly, in higher education." Through the Atidim in Industry Program, Assaf is getting a chance to not only receive a higher education, but also intern at a major high-tech company.

An initiative of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas agency, the Atidim (Futures) in Industry Program encourages and helps talented young people ages 21-30 from Israel's periphery to earn an academic degree after finishing their military service.

"When I was accepted to Bar-Ilan University, I was thrilled," says the high school honours graduate who was an officer in an elite combat unit prior to his 2004 discharge. "I had enough money for my first year of studies, but I wasn't sure how I would finance the next few years when my friend told me about Atidim.

Assaf was accepted into the program and receives a full tuition scholarship, a living stipend, a laptop computer, tutoring, work experience and integration in a leading Israeli company.

"It was more than the money that attracted me to Atidim," he says. "It was the fact that I am to be adopted by a high-tech company, have the opportunity to intern for them and gain valuable experience and possibly work for them upon graduation." (Photo by Shlomy Ben Ami)

Toronto students build shelters for the poor in Uruguay

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Rather than spend their reading week at an all-inclusive resort or catching up on homework and sleep, 15 Toronto students travelled to Uruguay last month to fulfill the Jewish obligation of tikkun olam.

Devora Schwartz Waxman, the Tzedek Hillel director, organized a trip that brought eight students from the University of Toronto and seven students from York University to Uruguay to build emergency housing for the country's less fortunate.

The York group, which was there from Feb 8-18, and the U of T group, which was there from Feb 18-27, were the first of seven groups from Hillels across North America scheduled to come to Montevideo, Uruguay to volunteer.

They worked with the Hillel in Uruguay and a non-governmental organization called A Roof For Uruguay, which aims to improve the quality of life of the poverty-stricken by building them emergency households and offering them an opportunity to improve their quality of life.

Waxman said that while the focus of the trip was to build shelters for the poor, she wanted to make sure to contextualize the mission for the participants.

"If you take them to build a house and just drop them off, they don't have a sense of why they're there. We did sessions with them about the Jewish community in Uruguay, the economic crisis in the region, we did tours of different neighbourhoods so that when they went to build, they had a good sense of where they were and why they were there," Waxman said.

Hagai Kuperman, 23, a political science student at U of T, felt that this trip was a great opportunity get a first-hand, world perspective and to lend a hand to those who needed one.

"When you're in [Montevideo], it looks OK because there is the upper class of really wealthy people and then there are people who are begging on the street, just like in Toronto. But then you go to a community – we drove maybe about 20 minutes outside of the city – and it is like a dump. There is garbage everywhere," Kuperman said.

Amaris Seigel, a 23-year-old psychology student at York was also taken aback by the conditions in which they lived.

"Emotionally, it was a very difficult trip for me because to see how they are living, in one-room homes, ones that they built themselves from rusted metal. It was so dirty," said Seigel, who is involved with Tzedek Hillel and took part in last year's trip to Mississippi during which they repaired the roofs of homes devastated by Hurricane Katrina.

Aside from building the shelters, the participants also had the opportunity to spend time with the Jewish community.

"We spent time at one of the Jewish community centres, at the Hillel, and we also went twice to volunteer at the Jewish old age home. It was a volunteer-focused trip, but there was also time for the students to enjoy themselves and enjoy their break," Waxman said.

"We got to go out at night and really party it up in the clubs and live like we were a part of that community and the society there," Kuperman added.

"[Uruguayans] just want to have a good time and get an education and get a job and move up in the world. We're all human and we all want the same thing."

Although there were many experiences to draw from, Waxman, Kuperman and Seigel agreed that one of the trip highlights was taking part in the Friday night services at the Hillel community centre.

"It was interesting because… they sing the same songs with the same words and the same tunes and we're on the other side of the world. It shows that Jews everywhere are similar and that [even if] you don't speak the same language, it is our religion and our prayers that unite us," Waxman said.

She said that both the Jewish community and the community in general were so welcoming, warm and appreciative of their help.

"One of the men we built one of the houses for just couldn't thank us enough," Waxman said.

Seigel hopes that more Jewish youth will become involved in initiatives that aim to help those in need.

"It's what we're supposed to do. Our religion is not a passive one. It's about taking action when action is required… It is our job as wealthy North Americans, who are wealthy compared to the rest of the world, to do something. It is an obligation."

Coast to Coast

Media move beyond convenient and familiar

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

As recent "According to Reports" columns have noted, there has been a shift in international media attention on the Middle East away from Israel specifically and toward developments in the region as a whole.

From time to time, when there is an important development in Palestinian-Israeli and Arab-Israeli relations, the media will certainly focus on Israel. But generally, the media shift to the broader region continues in a number of ways.

• Iran: Iran's defiance of the UN Security Council demand that it stop programs that can lead to the development of nuclear weapons has drawn substantial media attention. So, too, has the fact that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeatedly threatened to "wipe Israel off the map," and has even threatened European states that support Israel.

• Sunni-Shiite schism: The March 5 issue of Time magazine devoted its cover story, "Why They Hate Each Other," to the growing and potentially increasingly violent divide between Sunni and Shiite Muslims – a clash currently taking place in Iraq and Lebanon, but one that could also affect other areas of the Middle East. As non-Arab, but Shiite-dominant, Iran tries to exert its influence throughout the Sunni-dominant Arab world, many analysts are warning that a clash "within Islam" demands our attention and understanding. Examples include Iran's support of Hezbollah in Lebanon; its efforts to fund Hamas in Gaza and the West Bank; and its threat to the oil-rich Arab Gulf states, principally Saudi Arabia – this despite Ahmadinejad's recent meeting with the Saudi king in Riyadh.

In the March 4 issue of the New York Times Magazine, Noah Feldman, a law professor, author and expert on the Mideast wrote, in "Choosing a Sect," that while historically Sunnis and Shiites maintained relatively harmonious relations, there were episodic spasms of violence. "[T]he latest iteration of the Sunni-Shiite conflict," Feldman writes, is the one in Iraq which is "polariz[ing] Muslims across the globe."

Writing in Time, Bobby Ghosh noted that "As early as 2004, Jordan's King Abdullah warned of a rising Shiite 'crescent' running from Iran through Iraq and Syria to Lebanon."

While there are currently some efforts to achieve Sunni-Shiite rapprochement, Ghosh warned that if Iran continues to back Shiite militias and Arab states back Sunnis, conflict could continue in several states for years to come.

• Russia: Under President Vladimir Putin, Russia, flush with oil and gas revenue, has been flexing its muscles against the United States, which Moscow views as hobbled by the imbroglio in Iraq. Russia may be trying to reassert its influence in the Middle East by, among other things, supporting a PA "unity" government in which Hamas still refuses to abide by the Quartet conditions that Russia as a member formerly insisted upon: recognition of Israel's right to exist, renunciation of violence and support for previous agreements.

Russia is also supplying Syria with arms and is completing (though with some delays) a $1-billion nuclear reactor in Iran. This is in addition to supplying Iran with an advanced anti-aircraft missile defence system worth $700 million, which could be used against a possible Israeli assault on Iran's nuclear weapons sites.

Writing in the National Post, ("Russia re-enters lucrative arena in Middle East," March 5), Matthew Fisher noted that Putin recently hosted Hamas leader Khaled Meshal in Moscow for the second time in a year. Putin reportedly assured Meshal that Russia would try to end the U.S.-led aid boycott of the Palestinian Authority.

Last week, there were news reports that Russian journalist Ivan Safranov was likely murdered by Putin's security forces for investigating secretive Russian arms sales to Iran and Syria. Safranov allegedly "fell" out of his fifth-floor apartment window before he could file his story. As mentioned in the Mar. 7 Globe and Mail editorial, "Russian reporters at risk," Safranov joins a list of reporters, now numbering 20, who have died in the line of work in Russia since Putin came to power in 2000.

The convenient and familiar Mideast story is Israel. But in pursuing these other less familiar stories, the media are showing a growing appreciation for the region's complexity. At a time when many voices are decrying a "dumbing down" of the news, this is an encouraging development.

Purim reveller tried to ram officer with car, police say

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A representative of the chassidic communities denies that anyone tried to hit a Montreal police officer with a car during a night of Purim revelry by young men on de Vimy Street.

"Absolutely not. There was no intent to harm," Mayer Feig, leader of the Jewish Orthodox Community Council (JOCC), told The CJN. Feig said he did not witness the alleged incident, but said he was on the scene shortly after it happened.

At the end of last week, police were searching for an as-yet unidentified man who was driving the car. From the information gathered so far, police believe he deliberately attempted to drive into the officer, said spokesperson Sgt. Ian Lafreniere.

The suspect, a man apparently in his 50s, could be charged with armed assault and intimidation.

Lafreniere said police arrived on de Vimy, north of Van Horne Avenue, at 12:50 a.m., Sunday, March 4, responding to complaints by residents about the noise of firecrackers.

He said the police were not aware it was a Jewish holiday and that a number of house-parties were taking place on the street.

They found a lot of people on the street, many of them intoxicated, and decided to close off the block for their safety. "We didn't do it because we were mad at them. We were trying to help them out, so that nobody would get injured," Lafreniere said.

A female officer was put in charge of maintaining order and issued a small number of tickets for public drunkenness, jaywalking and disobedience, he said.

While she was ticketing two young men, a third man – the suspect – came by, took a photo of the officer with a cellphone, yelled at the two men that they didn't have to listen to her and that they could leave, Lafreniere said.

The older man got into a vehicle and the officer went behind it to take down the licence plate number. According to Lafreniere, the man put the car into reverse. The officer jumped out of the way and was not struck.

She then went to the front of the car to get the number, and he drove forward. The officer again got out of the way unhurt.

The driver lost control of the car, skidded into a snowbank, regained control and drove into the driveway of a house on the street and went inside, Lafreniere said.

The officer, now with back-up, followed but could not positively identify the driver because there were about 50 other people in the house, most dressed in a similar manner.

Lafreniere said the suspect is not the owner of the car. The car's owner is also the owner of the house. That individual had not been questioned yet.

Feig's version is that the party-goers were "upset" by the blocking of the street and the issuing of "many" tickets by the officer, including a number for parking violations, which he thought would not normally be given. "The community felt targeted," and the fact it was a holiday was not taken into account, he said.

He agreed with the police account that an individual took a photo of the officer, but not that he told the men she was dealing with to ignore her. Feig said the man then got in a car and simply drove away.

Feig said alcohol was consumed, but he denies that anyone was drunk or disorderly.

He said the young people were going from house to house to parties in the Orthodox neighbourhood, and that festivities were not taking place on the street.

Feig described the JOCC as a representative body for all of the chassidic congregations in the Outremont area.

Immediately after news of the incident broke, the JOCC issued a press release that it was "horrified" by the allegation that young chassidim were told not to pay attention to a female police officer.

"Our position is clear: The Talmud states 'dina dmalchisa dina' – the law of the land is the law. As equal citizens residing in Quebec, all members of authority, both female and male, are held in the highest regard and the laws of the land are respected. These values are taught to our children as well. Any allegation to the contrary is unjust."

Tone of accommodation debate concerns federation

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Federation CJA officials broke their silence on the reasonable accommodation debate that has preoccupied Quebec for months, saying some aspects of it have been "hurtful" to the Jewish community, and criticizing the media for sensationalizing the issue and politicians for using it for partisan purposes.

In an interview with The CJN, federation first vice-president Marc Gold and Joseph Gabay, immediate past president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, said they want the community to know that its leadership takes the issue very seriously and is monitoring the election campaign closely.

"We are troubled by the tone of the debate and the disproportionate coverage in the media, especially the French media, and especially of the Jewish community," said Gold, who feels some outlets have been competing with one another to "exploit" incidents and "blow them out of proportion."

He thinks many of the incidents highlighted are not about reasonable accommodation at all, or at least not as it is understood in the Canadian and Quebec charters of rights and freedoms as latitude to avoid discrimination.

Instead, Gold believes reasonable accommodation has become a "catch-all" for situations that will inevitably arise from time to time in a multicultural society, often in good faith. Certainly, he said, it is not as if the Jewish community is demanding accommodation, or asking that society change in any way.

"We feel we have been singled out, that we are carrying this on our backs," Gold said.

Gold and Gabay are concerned by the way the three major provincial leaders have dealt with the issue, and the federation has communicated with all of them.

"We expect our leaders to elevate the tone of the debate," Gold said. "Unfortunately, the issue has been used for partisan political purposes."

The federation applauds Premier Jean Charest's creation of a study commission on reasonable accommodation, and intends to participate fully. It is encouraged that the task has been entrusted to two eminent academics, Gerard Bouchard and Charles Taylor.

"We hope this will lead to a more reasonable and thoughtful discussion," Gabay said.

Gold said he was bothered, however, by some things Charest said at the launch of the commission in early February.

At the time, Charest cited a Montreal YMCA's frosting of its windows at the request of Chassidim, a Montreal police guideline that female officers avoid dealing with chassidic men, and the Jewish General Hospital's expulsion of a man for bringing in non-kosher food as contrary to the notion of reasonable accommodation.

The federation is preparing a brief to be presented to the commission, which begins its work this month, and is seeking wide input from the community. The commission has not yet announced when it will hold public hearings.

The effort is being managed by an "advocacy summit" composed of professional and lay representatives of the Quebec-Israel Committee and Communauté sépharade unifiée du Québec, as well as CJC and the federation.

The fundamental points the brief will make are that the Jewish community has a long history here and shares Quebec's basic values and that the Canadian and Quebec charters are the appropriate framework for the resolution of conflicts.

Gold said a debate over how to live harmoniously in a diverse society, including the clash between religious and secular values, is normal and healthy, and is happening elsewhere in the West.

Gabay said the Jewish community is sensitive to the fact that the debate has distinct aspects here because of Quebec's history and unique culture in North America. Since the Quiet Revolution of the 1960s, Quebec has been shedding the dominant role religion played in public life and institutions to the point that today, secularism has become a supreme value.

Consequently, he said, there is a tendency to "panic" whenever religion appears to be encroaching on the public sphere.

Asked if he felt anti-Semitism underlay the attention given to certain incidents, Gabay said, "The short answer is no."

Gold added, "It's very complex; it's impossible to find one cause."

They hope that one of the outcomes of the Bouchard-Taylor commission will be a better understanding of the diversity of the Jewish community.

Community members wishing to give their opinion on reasonable accommodation should e-mail cjc-quebec@cjc.ca.

Child custody: waivers and lies

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

Q I have been separated for 3 years and I have a 5 year old daughter. Her father gives me child support off and on but really I don't care if he does and neither does he. But I want to get divorced and not have to go through a child support and custody battle. Can I get divorced without having to deal with child support and custody?

A You can apply for a Divorce with the court without requesting custody or child support. However, by law you must disclose in court documents that you have a child, that the child lives primarily with you, the identity of the father, any knowledge of his income, and that you are declining to apply for child support. Believe it or not, under the Child Support Guidelines of the Divorce Act, a Judge has a legal duty prior to granting a divorce to ensure that the parent not living with the child is ordered to pay the appropriate amount of child support in accordance with his income, even though you are not applying for it. To ensure that you are not denied a divorce you should either apply for child support and give some evidence of the father's annual income or explain convincingly in the affidavit in support of your divorce motion why you do not seek it and why it is in the child's best interests for you to waive it. The same law does not apply to custody matters. However, you can apply for a divorce without requesting a custody order.

Q I am currently in a custody dispute with my wife concerning our two sons. My wife lied to the court about me abusing her and the children in order to gain temporary custody of the children. I have more than enough evidence to prove that she intentionally lied. How likely is the court to find her in contempt? What is the best approach to force the court to hold her accountable for her lies?

A No question that perjury is a criminal offence, but parents are very rarely prosecuted. Moreover, it is only "contempt" if she has disobeyed a court order. However, the more she lies the more she loses credibility. But disproving her lies doesn't necessarily prove you are the superior parent. You must now demonstrate your intimate understanding, skill and acquaintance of the children's needs. Warring parents often lose sight of what Judges look for. What is your evidence of the children's needs, not just merely of mom's faults and lies?

Winnipeg Purim brunch draws 170 people

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The Purim brunch held at the Fort Garry Hotel on Purim day, March 4, was the first of its kind for the Winnipeg Jewish community.

The lavish brunch was organized by Ohr HaTorah Day School, the only modern Orthodox school in Winnipeg.

"We had 170 people here, even though we only began publicizing the event two weeks before Purim. There [were] a lot of other Purim events going on in the city… and yet we were completely sold out. There [were] a lot of new faces here," said Rabbi David Weksler, the school's principal.

"Aviva Cohen and Tina Geenfield, two parents at the school, did an amazing job organizing this," he added.

Carrie Slayen, left, 7, and Leah Corne, 8, had their faces painted at Ohr Hatorah Day School's Purim brunch.

Ohr Hatorah Day School, located in the Herzlia-Adas Yeshurun Synagogue, was founded almost 10 years ago by a small group of families who did not want to have to leave Winnipeg to provide their children with an Orthodox Jewish education. Today, the school, which has an enrolment of 52, offers kindergarten through Grade 8, as well as having a full day-care program. Since there are fewer than 75 Orthodox Jewish families in Winnipeg, it has always been a challenge to sustain an Orthodox school in Winnipeg.

"We had a lot of families come to the Purim brunch who do not have children in our school. Clearly, there is interest in the larger Jewish community for this kind of event… We really didn't have to do much to sell the tickets. People were just calling in to the school to reserve places," said Greenfield.

The brunch began with Rabbi Weksler reading the Megillah to an audience that loudly stamped out the name of Haman. Afterward, the children marched on stage to show off their costumes and all received prizes.

Those in attendance were then treated to an attractive spread of food, which had people returning to the buffet for second and third helpings.

After the meal, the children were treated to a magic show and other entertainment. Each child received a special mishloach manot package to take home.

Mishloach manot baskets were also sold at the event. Part of the proceeds from the sale of the baskets went to the Half-Shekel Task Force of Winnipeg's Jewish Federation, which directs money to impoverished members of the local Jewish community.

A raffle was also drawn for numerous prizes.

"Ohr HaTorah Day School put together an elegant, delicious, innovative Purim celebration for the whole community. We've celebrated Purim many different ways over the years, but the brunch was something new and different. It had oodles of flair and was tons of fun," said Danita Aziza, who attended the event with her husband and family members, including her parents.

Leonard Schwartz said: "It was the best Purim event I've ever attended."

Tayne Sinclair said: "The food… was excellent and the entertainment for the kids was great… I didn't win a prize, but there's always next year."

In fact, many at the brunch were telling organizers that they had to make sure to repeat the event again next year.

Yossi Cohen, the president of Ohr HaTorah Day School, said he was pleased with the turnout at the brunch and believes the school will continue to increase its profile in the community.

"Ohr HaTorah is at capacity registration this year. Unlike previous years, there is great demand for spaces… I think the future looks very promising," he said.

Cohen added that "over the last several years, a significant portion of Orthodox Jews from Winnipeg have chosen to move to Toronto or other Jewish centres, especially families with older children. It's natural for Winnipeg's Orthodox Jews to want to migrate to a city with a much larger vibrant Orthodox community.

"But those of us who have stayed in Winnipeg are dedicated to ensuring that our school will not only survive, but grow."

Complaint against 'Quebecistan' column upheld

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The Quebec Press Council has upheld complaints against National Post columnist Barbara Kay that her Aug. 9 column headlined "The rise of Quebecistan" unfairly portrayed francophone Quebecers, especially sovereigntists, as soft on terrorism and anti-Semitic.

The council ruled Mar. 5 that the column, which was a commentary on the massive march against the war between Israel and Hezbollah held in Montreal three days earlier, lacked "balance, rigour, level-headedness, and... respect for certain social groups."

The council said columnists can be controversial but still must be accurate and avoid sweeping generalizations.

It said that "they must avoid, as much in tone as in the language they use, giving events a significance that they do not have or leaving misunderstandings that risk discrediting persons or groups."

The council said Kay did not put the rally in context and attributed intentions to public personalities without supporting information. It said she "distorted facts" in order to support her view that the leaders of an independent Quebec would remove Hezbollah from the terrorist list and that the new country would generally be welcoming to terrorists.

The council further commented that Kay's was an "unwarranted provocation" that perpetuated prejudices.

Kay reproached Bloc Québécois leader Gilles Duceppe, Parti Québécois leader André Boisclair, federal Liberal MP Denis Coderre and Amir Khadir, spokesperson for the new party Québec Solidaire, for participating in the Aug. 6 march. The event, which was endorsed by 60 groups, was held to denounce Israel's actions in Lebanon and demand a ceasefire. It drew about 15,000 people, including a small number of people carrying Hezbollah flags and placards that were construed as anti-Semitic.

The plaintiffs were Jean Dorion, president of the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste de Montréal; Gilles Rhéaume, spokesperson for La Ligue contre la francophobie canadienne; and individuals Francis Leger, Martin Proulx and Josée Beaulieu. The council says the complaints were supported by eight other persons, not named in the decision.

They felt that Kay had drawn unsubstantiated conclusions that could foster hatred of Quebecers.

Dorion felt she was off the mark in making a link between Quebecers' sympathy for the Lebanese victims of Israel's intervention and, as she wrote, "the fat streak of anti-Semitism that has marbled the intellectual discourse of Quebec throughout its history."

While acknowledging that anti-Semitism has existed in Quebec "like all the rest of the western world," Dorion took Kay to task for ignoring that the "national intellectual elites" of Quebec were often in the forefront of the struggle for Jewish rights, pointing to the 1832 act passed by the legislature of Lower Canada entrenching Jewish emancipation.

Dorion also observed that a group of "clearly identifiable" Jews present at march were "warmly applauded", which he believes shows the participants were not against the Jewish community, but rather the actions of the Israeli government.

He also took great exception to Kay's assertion that, "You can bet that Hezbollah would be off the official terrorism list by Day Two of the Republic of Quebec's existence."

Dorion insisted that the number of persons carrying Hezbollah flags was very tiny and their presence "inevitable" in a crowd that size. He asserted that it did not give Kay licence to denounce Duceppe, Boisclair, Coderre and Khadir as "shameless Quebec politicians who led that pro-terrorist rally."

The SSJB was not one of the groups officially endorsing the rally.

Gerald Owen, who handles complaints for the National Post, responded to the complaint by providing the council a copy of a follow-up column by Kay that appeared Aug. 17, headlined "Quebecers in denial: Counterpoint." Kay reiterated many of the points she made in her first piece, including her central theme that if the province separates it could indeed become "Quebecistan," where "Islamo-fascism" could take root, in part due to pressure from Shiite Lebanese immigrants.

She also wrote that the organizers of the Aug. 6 rally criticized only Israel and not Hezbollah in their advance publicity, and she alleged that they deliberately excluded a Jewish presence. This should have warned off politicians who wanted to remain neutral on the conflict, she suggested.

In an interview with The CJN, Kay dismissed the decision and questioned the council's motives. She believes the council is trying to "chill" criticism of Quebec by anglophone journalists and those outside the province. She said she doesn't recognize the council as having any moral authority or as being capable of impartial review.

"I'm sure they are trying to intimidate me and other anglo journalists, and hoped there would be repercussions against me at the Post... This is a bogus group of soft totalitarians with the impulse to shut people up."

The council is composed of journalists, media managers and members of the public.

Kay said that in a free society, objections to a journalist's opinion should be dealt with between that journalist and their readers or by other media. Kay said she received more than 300 e-mails related to the Aug. 9 column and answered all of them. She also accepted every request from the media for an interview, including television and radio.

Kay, who lives in Montreal, said Quebecers are "hypersensitive" and are trying to suppress outside criticism. "In Quebec, you can say anything you want, as long as it's in French."

She said the Post won't appeal the decision, which it has the right to do within 30 days.

Celebrate with the Stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 20 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 10 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Wednesday, March 21, 2007 at Meron Banquet Hall. It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:00 p.m. This year Ines DiSanto Couture will be presenting their 2007 bridal collection on a fabulous runway fashion show, which will begin promptly at 8 p.m.

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centre-pieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-669-0777.

Celebrity chefs take on kosher cuisine for a cause

To be held on March 18 from 6 p.m. to 10 p.m. at the Four Seasons Hotel, it features some of the city's most acclaimed chefs including Susur Lee, Mathew Sutherland and Robert Bartley, who will take on the challenge of creating a creative, gourmet, kosher menu – a culinary masterpiece.

> 'Kosher laws and culinary creativity go hand in hand'

Tickets are $500 each for a dinner that includes soup, fish appetizer, main course and dessert, all kosher of course.

"Kosher laws and culinary creativity go hand in hand," says centre executive director Rabbi Elie Karfunkel. "All over North America, Israel, and in Toronto, too, there are gourmet kosher restaurants. This event will bring that kind of excellence in kosher food to a larger audience."

Proceeds from the evening will go toward the new $10-million dollar facility to be built in the heart of Forest Hill.

Established more than seven years ago, the Forest Hill Jewish Centre has attracted some of the city's younger Jews, drawn to the welcoming and relaxed atmosphere created by Rabbi Karfunkel and his wife, Rifky, who have created a traditional Jewish gathering place in Forest Hill Village.

"The first time I went to the centre, I thought it was cool that its temporary location was above Starbucks. But smelling all that delicious coffee made fasting on Yom Kippur even more difficult," says member Theo Aben.

The new building will be modelled after the Jaslo Synagogue that was destroyed in Poland during the Holocaust. A main feature of the new facility will be the Learning Exchange, a place for meeting, exchanging ideas, investigating Judaism's depth and ensuring its continuity. The centre's theme will be "Honouring the Past, Building the Future." Organizers say it's changing the face of Spadina Road forever while empowering the Jewish future.

Daddo brings Ladino music to Toronto

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Audiences in Toronto were treated to something beautiful and unique last week – the Israeli world-music band, Daddo Ladino, touring in support of their new album, Daddo: The Ladino Voice.

In town to play a show at the Canadian Music Week Festival, one of the first Israeli groups to do so, Daddo Ladino also performed a one-night-only concert on March 7, at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue.

An eager crowd of nearly 400 people crammed into the synagogue, many unsure what to anticipate from a style of music and language they were unfamiliar with.

"Ladino music? What's that? I thought it was Latino music tonight," quipped one patron before the show.

His question was soon answered, as Shuli Atar, the Israeli consul in Toronto, introduced the performance.

"We in Israel are fortunate to live in a country with so many cultures in one place," Atar enthused. "Tonight we will enjoy a concert in Ladino!"

With that, lead singer and band namesake Dganit Daddo, leapt onstage and, backed by her able five-piece band, wowed the crowd with songs that borrowed elements from klezmer, classical and Spanish styles.

Daddo, also an acclaimed star with Israel's Habima National Theatre, let loose with soaring vocals and playful stage theatrics, to the delight of the audience.

Playing a mix of Ladino and Hebrew folk tunes, Daddo exhorted the crowd to sing along to the tunes they knew, and helped them learn the choruses to those they didn't.

It took a couple of songs for the audience to warm to Daddo's music, but by the third, it was a veritable love-fest.

Ladino, a Judeo-Hispanic dialect with roots in 15th-century Spanish, was spoken by Sephardi communities across the Mediterranean after their expulsion from Spain in 1492.

The language evolved and adopted words and phrases from other tongues, including Turkish, Arabic, Greek, French and Hebrew.

It has dwindled as a language over the years, in part as a result of immigration and the reintegration of modern Spanish into communities that previously spoke Ladino.

Today, Israel is home to the largest concentration of Ladino-speakers, with approximately 200,000 who can still speak or understand the language.
